Welcome! Haere mai!

Welcome to Massey University Press, a publisher of intelligent, relevant books for intelligent, inquiring readers. Just like our university, we want our books to shape the nation and drive the new New Zealand.

We’ve been in business since 2016, and in that time we’ve produced books of which we are hugely proud and we’ve won a clutch of awards. We are privileged to work with so many brilliant authors, designers, photographers and illustrators.

Welcome to our 2024 catalogue, and please enjoy taking a look around.

This lively and compelling story of Te Whare o Rehua Sarjeant Gallery begins before Henry Sarjeant had even dreamed of a 'fine art gallery' for the burgeoning small town of Whanganui. It reveals the Sarjeant Gallery's early years and its development as a collecting and exhibiting institution that is now recognised as one of New Zealand's finest.

Generously illustrated with many works from the rich, varied and important collection, this book places the gallery at the heart of the story of Whanganui and marks its triumphal reopening in 2024.

MARTIN EDMOND is an award-winning writer, screenwriter and poet. Edmond received a Prime Minister's Award for Literary Achievement in 2013. He lives in Australia and Japan.

Woolsheds
The historic shearing sheds of Aotearoa New Zealand
ANNETTE O’SULLIVAN AND JANE USSHER

Exquisitely photographed by Jane Ussher, Woolsheds takes readers to historic sheep stations in the North and South islands and explores the rich histories of this key primary industry that are contained in their heritage shearing sheds.

From the oldest working woolshed in Mid Canterbury to woolsheds rebuilt after earthquakes, it is a celebration of the tenacity of the sheep-farming sector.

DR ANNETTE O’SULLIVAN is a design academic and former senior lecturer in typography at Massey University School of Design. Her doctorate examined the design histories of branding and identity on historic New Zealand sheep stations.

JANE USSHER MNZM is one of New Zealand’s most lauded photographers.

Resetting the Coordinates

An anthology of performance art in Aotearoa New Zealand

EDITED BY CHRISTOPHER BRADDOCK, IOANA GORDON-SMITH, LAYNE WAEREA AND VICTORIA WYNNE-JONES

The first anthology/reader of performance art of Aotearoa New Zealand, Resetting the Coordinates offers a lively, 50-year critical survey of Aotearoa New Zealand’s globally unique performance art scene.

From the post-object and performance art of the late 1960s to the rich vein of Māori and Pacific performance art from the early 1990s, its 18 chapters by researchers and practitioners is a major reference for art and performance communities of New Zealand, Australia and further afield.

DR CHRISTOPHER BRADDOCK is a professor of visual arts at Auckland University of Technology.

DR LAYNE WAEREA (Ngāti Wāhiao, Ngāti Kahungunu) is a senior lecturer in the School of Art and Design at Auckland University of Technology.

IOANA GORDON-SMITH (NZ/Samoan) is Curator Māori Pacific at Pātaka Art + Museum, Porirua.

Edith Collier
Early New Zealand modernist
EDITED BY JILL TREVELYAN, JENNIFER TAYLOR AND GREG DONSON

Edith Collier was a dynamic modernist, and the story of her years in Europe and then her return to New Zealand and the near abandonment of her practice are compelling as both art history and an affecting human story. A century on, her remarkable body of work remains fresh and contemporary.

Featuring over 150 artworks, this book’s major essay by award-winning art writer Jill Trevelyan and its collection of guest essays offer a deep and rich immersion in Collier’s craft.

JILL TREVELYAN is an award-winning writer and curator.

JENNIFER TAYLOR works closely with the Edith Collier Trust Collection.

GREG DONSON has been Curator and Programmes Manager at the Sarjeant Gallery Te Whare o Rehua Whanganui since 2007.

Artists in Antarctica

PATRICK SHEPHERD

What transformation happens when writers, musicians and artists stand in the vast, cold spaces of Antarctica? This book brings together paintings, photographs, texts and musical scores by New Zealand artists who have been to the ice. It explores the impact of this experience on their art and art process, as well as the physical challenges of working in a harsh and unfamiliar environment. Antarctic science, nature and human history are explored through the creative lens of some of New Zealand’s most acclaimed artists, composers and writers, including Nigel Brown, Margaret Elliot, Dick Frizzell, Anne Noble, Virginia King, Grahame Sydney, Ronnie van Hout, Phil Dadson, Gareth Farr, Lloyd Jones and Owen Marshall.

The Sun Is a Star
A voyage through the universe
DICK FRIZZELL

"The universe — and everything in it — is always expanding into tomorrow... What a scene, eh? More magic than magic. Magic, mysterious and beautiful. And here we are. On the third rock from the sun, figuring it out."

In this enchanting book for readers of all ages, renowned New Zealand painter Dick Frizzell takes his lifelong interest in the stars, the planets, space and the universe and turns it into a book that demystifies everything from white dwarfs and black holes to space travel. His artist friends, including John Pule, Greg O'Brien, John Reynolds, Judy Darragh, Reuben Paterson, Grahame Sydney, Karl Maughan, Ani O'Neill, Reg Mombassa and Wayne Youle, provide the illustrations.

DICK FRIZZELL MNZM is one of New Zealand's best known and most versatile painters. He studied at the Ilam School of Fine Arts at the University of Canterbury and had a long career in advertising. Alongside his career as a painter, Frizzell is also the highly sought-after designer of a range of products from toys to wine.

Ceramic artist Vonney Ball’s elegant output reflects a sound education in English ceramics design, a singularity of purpose and a drive to keep creating. Twenty years on from her arrival in New Zealand, her work connects cultural experiences from opposite ends of the earth.

HELEN SCHAMROTH ONZM has been writing about craft, design and art for more than four decades. Her writing has featured in national and international publications. Her book 100 New Zealand Craft Artists (Godwit) won two Montana Book Awards in 1999 and she was a contributing writer to the books West (Random House) and Waitakere Ranges: Ranges of Inspiration (Waitakere Ranges Protection Society).

‘This book proves its worth by demonstrating how Ball’s work responds to, reflects, and contributes to our country’s visual and material language’

SAM TRUBRIDGE, ARTZONE
By the time Marcus Taylor graduated from veterinary school at age 23, a sheep, a cow, a hawk, innumerable dogs, cats, parrots and even a fish had locked their mandibles onto his flesh. Each bite only intrigued him further.

From his first entanglement with a cow in ketosis in Canterbury to a beagle in heart failure in Newfoundland, and all manner of adventures and heartbreak in between, this memoir of the early career of a young New Zealand vet is both heartwarming and hilarious.

Marcus Taylor graduated with a degree in veterinary science from Massey University in 2013 and went straight into mixed practice. He later worked in Newfoundland and southern England, and then he worked for a year on an animal-health research project with the Bedouin in the Middle East.

The farmer looked troubled and seemed jumpy as he made his way over to my truck, confirming my fears that this might not be a run-of-the-mill call-out.

‘Sheza-goer. She’ll go ya, shehwill!’ His rapid-fire sentences blended words into a language of their own.

‘Dahryt?’ I answered, grateful that I’d grown up close enough to farm gates to pick up an ear for this unique dialect.

‘Y ep, shezhaddacrackahme, o’ll tell ya. A reeeal goer,’ he warned.

Translation: She attacked me, so look out.

The farmer’s eyes were wide, and there was a tremor in his voice. Given his obvious years of farming experience, this anxiety surprised me.

I turned my attention to the cow. Her head was turned back in our direction, and she was glaring at us. Her eyes were wild, and her head twitched. Ketosis. A condition that occurs when an animal’s blood sugar is very low, it can send cattle into a hyperactive, aggressive frenzy. Prolonged labour, like the kind this cow was experiencing, is a common cause.

Even from where I was standing, I could see the nose of her partially born calf sticking out of her back end, and it didn’t look like it was moving in a hurry. I paused to consider my options. None of them looked great.

To my astonishment, I realised my companion was already creeping like a midnight assassin towards the nervous cow. I hadn’t even had time to grab my rope. Left with little choice, I joined him, planning to time my dash along with his. We would jump on her head and immobilise her before she could get to her feet and charge us. I moved towards the cow, creeping a little faster to catch up with the farmer. Again, I underestimated his eagerness. Within seconds, he had dashed ahead of me and leapt onto the cow with full gusto.

‘HEAWEGO!’ he bellowed.

The panicked cow thrashed her head from side to side as he landed on her muscular neck. Head-to-head the two struggled before she managed to toss him off, flailing like a doll.
Frontline Surgeon
New Zealand medical pioneer
Douglas Jolly

MARK DERBY

Central Otago-born Doug Jolly was one of the greatest war surgeons of the twentieth century. Tireless, dedicated and courageous in his surgical work with the International Brigades in the Spanish Civil War, his surgical manual, based on battlefield experiences close to the front line, was widely used in later conflicts. Frontline Surgeon traces Jolly’s remarkable career and restores him to the ranks of pioneers of modern medicine.

MARK DERBY has been published in Britain, Spain and the US. He lives on Wellington’s south coast.

“There was some confusion ahead of us,” Allan wrote later. “A tank was approaching. It had been strafed by a Nationalist plane and was driving erratically, weaving across the road. Our car swung to the left to avoid it. ‘Hold on,’ Gerda laughed. The car went out of control; began to roll.” The heavy vehicle lumbered off the road and into a ditch, where it overturned, its tires gradually stilling. Allan was flung clear, crushing his leg as he landed, but Taro, lying unconscious on the roadside, was run over by another Republican tank and critically injured.

An ambulance was somehow summoned, and the two crash victims were transferred to it. A British field hospital had been established nearby in a former seminary beside the vast sixteenth-century monastery of El Escorial. At the height of the Brunete battle, three surgeons had worked there simultaneously, but only one now remained on duty to treat casualties of the retreat—a New Zealander in his early thirties named Doug Jolly. It was early evening when Taro’s mangled body was carried into the hospital’s ground-floor reception room on a stretcher. She was alive but barely. Irene Goldin, an operating theater nurse from New York, recalled that “her intestines were hanging out.”

After she was given a blood transfusion, Taro regained consciousness and pleaded with Jolly to send telegrams to Capa in Paris and to the French magazine Ce Soir, which commissioned their work. He promised to do this but could see that little more could be done for her, and he instructed nurse Goldin to move the young woman to a room by herself and “maintain her as well as possible without pain.” Eviscerated and dying, Taro nevertheless managed to ask Goldin in English, “Are my cameras all right? They’re new.”

A personal history of midwifery in Aotearoa
JOAN SKINNER

This warm, richly detailed and sometimes shocking account by one of Aotearoa's leading midwives is a story of life and death, privilege and diversity, and human connection. It weaves the story of the medicalisation of childbirth and the rise of the homebirth movement with the experiences of women across five decades of immense social change in Aotearoa. Vital reading for all involved in women's health, from medical professionals to researchers, community workers and students.

JOAN SKINNER is a long-time midwife and in 2019 completed a master's in creative writing at the International Institute of Modern Letters at Te Herenga Waka Victoria University of Wellington.

‘Skinner intersperses the broader narrative of midwifery in New Zealand with stories from her own experiences’
SHANTI MATHIAS, THE SPINOFF

I stood in the far corner of the bright room, holding my breath, trying to be neither seen nor heard. The woman opposite me was lying flat on her back on the high, narrow bed, her eyes squeezed shut, her right hand gripping her husband's. Crushing it, white-hot. Her other arm was strapped down, and a plastic tube emerged from the bandages, connected to a glass bottle suspended from a metal pole. Her legs were pulled far apart and hung in two straps, from two more poles, swaying. She tried to roll from side to side, agitated and in pain. The bottle clanged against the pole. An overhead light, a metre wide, was focused, full-beam, on her exposed perineum. Her bottom was at the very edge of the bed. It looked precarious and I worried about the baby landing on the floor.

‘Give us a nice big push, love. We can nearly see the head.’ The midwife's voice and movements were brisk and insensitive. She had spread sterile drapes along the woman's legs and across her stomach, seeming to separate the woman from her birth. The midwife wore a mask, and her hair was covered in a cap. A white gown, nearly to the ground, and sterile gloves completed her attire. She, too, seemed to have become removed from what was happening.

Yet here were two women, connected in their work.

The door burst open beside me and the doctor, also dressed in white, strode in. He was wearing a floor-length plastic apron and, for some reason, white gumboots, as if in an abattoir.

‘Thank you, nurse,’ he said to the midwife, who stepped aside, saying nothing.

‘Now Mrs Smith, give us another good push,’ he said as he snapped on his gloves, not looking at her.

‘Just a couple more contractions, dear. You’re nearly there.’
Perhaps the closest a human being comes to visiting another planet is to descend into the sea. In Soundings, Kennedy Warne connects his lifelong exploration of the underwater world with a global story of humanity’s relationship with the sea. Drawing on more than 20 years of fieldwork for National Geographic, he shares experiences that range from diving with harp seals under the sea ice of the Gulf of St Lawrence to following the legendary ‘sardine run’ along South Africa’s Wild Coast. From myriad underwater encounters a wider conversation emerges about human engagement with the sea. One question dominates: How can we care for and reconnect with the oceans around us?

KENNEDY WARNE is co-founder of New Zealand Geographic and often writes about the sea, including in his book Let Them Eat Shrimp.

I unlock the chain that tethers the dinghy to a pōhutukawa root on the Russell esplanade and pull it down over the smooth, rattling pebbles of the beach towards the water. I have known this beach for more than half a century. I skimmed its chocolate-coloured pebbles across the water when I was a child and have watched my own grandchildren do the same. I used to ‘bake’ my children in an umu made by heaping these sun-warmed stones on their bodies until only their mouths and nostrils showed. They would lie still until the heat or the claustrophobia got to them, then rise up like Lazarus, stones falling from their limbs, and dive into the sea.

It is autumn now, and my father is with me. We carry a chilly bin and food box, bedding, overnight bags, tools and paraphernalia down the steep beach to the dinghy. I take the oars and Dad pushes us off, manoeuvring his weak leg slowly over the transom and in. He had a hip replacement a few years ago. I’m in line for the same surgery. Like father, like son. I hope I do as well as he does at 92.

I row out to a white-hulled launch moored 50 metres off the beach, lift one of the oars from its rowlock holder and steady the dinghy against the stern. Dad steps on to the duckboard — not an original feature of the boat but one that makes life easier for everyone — and unzips the awning. There are rituals in all facets of boating, and the moment of entry is one. I fish for the keys in a pot of clothes pegs and unlock the varnished kauri doors that open to the saloon. The interior is cool and dim. There are only eight small portholes and two sets of skylights to allow light to enter — not like modern launches with their capacious windows. But we like the den-like feeling of enclosure. It’s how boats were designed in the era when Marline was built.
Not knowing your family story is a huge loss of your sense of self. It has the potential to undermine your wellbeing and your relationships across a lifetime. Adopted is the powerful and honest account of two of the thousands of children affected by closed adoption in Aotearoa New Zealand, from 1950 to the mid-1970s. Jo Willis and Brigitta Baker both sought and found their respective birthparents at different stages of their lives and have become advocates for other adopted New Zealanders. They share the complexity of that journey, the emotional challenges they faced, and the ongoing impacts of their adoptions, with candour and courage.

JO WILLIS is a specialist in the field of adoption counselling, coaching and education.

BRIGITTA BAKER’s professional experience ranges from advisory roles in the public sector to positions with large corporations within human resource management, training facilitation and leadership development.

I stepped out the back door of the house and hovered indecisively in the courtyard.

I could hear my husband speaking as he came down the steps not far from where I stood. He was answered by a cheerful sounding female voice.

‘God, that’s her,’ I thought as waves of pure adrenaline flooded through me and my stomach began to churn. The realisation flashed through my mind that she sounded quite chatty and relaxed, then a stranger stepped into the courtyard and started walking towards me.

What should I do? Should I hug her? Was she a ‘hugging’ sort of person? What was even appropriate behaviour in this bizarre situation? What should I say?

Before I could summon reason, I was in her arms, crying like a lost child and never wanting to let go. For several minutes a spell held us bound as we rocked gently together. It felt perfectly natural. There was no hesitation from her, no holding back, no stiffness. I have no idea what she said to me until she gently took hold of my shoulders and whispered, ‘Let me look at you properly.’

Backcountry adventuring in Aotearoa New Zealand

HAZEL PHILLIPS

One afternoon journalist Hazel Phillips decided to close her laptop and head for the hills. She spent the next three years living in mountain huts and tramping alone for days at a time, all the while holding down a full-time job. As she ranged from Arthur’s Pass to the Kaimanawa and Ruahine ranges and Fiordland she had her share of danger and loneliness, but she also grew in confidence and backcountry knowledge. Full of pluck, courage and resourcefulness, this book is for all those who long to breathe the mountain air and hear the call of the kea.

HAZEL PHILLIPS is a former journalist and strategic communications consultant. She has recently embarked on a Master’s in creative writing with Massey University, where she worked as Executive Director, Public Affairs. Her previous books include Sell!, a popular history of New Zealand advertising, and Wild Westie, a biography of Sir Bob Harvey. She is currently back in her old mountain stomping ground.

In 2016, disillusioned with what Auckland had become, I left. I didn’t know where I did want to live, but I figured that packing up and going on the road would at least help me figure out where I did want to live.

I was also disillusioned with the 40-hour work week standard approach of being chained to a desk, and I had switched jobs to a new gig where I was the only staff member in New Zealand. The rest of the company was based in Australia, so I was left on my own to get on with it. My work became entirely doable remotely, and flexibly – everything was done by my 13-inch laptop, iPad and mobile phone – and eventually it just seemed silly to stay in Auckland, with its housing and traffic challenges. (In the age of COVID-19, it now seems unthinkable, perhaps ridiculous, that we once demanded people be tied to a specific desk, in a specific office, for a specific period of time each week.)

And so I left. My Auckland flat, which I owned, had a separate storage space, around 12 square metres, and into this I packed up my whole life except for a tramping pack, boots, and ski gear. I rented it out via a property manager and cut a fast track south.

For the next three years I was strategically homeless. Home became wherever I’d chosen to be at that moment. Sometimes it was an alpine club lodge, sometimes a Department of Conservation hut, sometimes camping out in the bush or bedding down in a bivvy bag if I’d stuffed up and had nowhere to sleep. Sometimes it was a nice hotel in Sydney, when I had to travel for work, which always presented a bizarre contrast of lifestyles; I once spent the night at Rangiwahia Hut in the Ruahines, tramped out the next day, drove to Wellington airport, flew to Sydney and went to bed in a hotel that night.
Raiment
A memoir
JAN KEMP

Pioneering New Zealand poet Jan Kemp's memoir of her first 25 years is a vivid and frank account of growing up in the 1950s and of university life in the late 1960s and early 1970s. It tracks from an innocent Waikato childhood to the seedy flats of Auckland, where anarchic student life, drugs, sexual experimentation and a failing marriage could not keep her away from poetry. Weaving its own patterns and colours, Raiment shines a clear-eyed light on the heady, hedonistic hothouse of our literary community in the 1970s and reveals what it took, back then, to be an independent woman.

JAN KEMP MNZM is a poet and short fiction writer. She has published many collections of poetry, established the Aotearoa New Zealand Poetry Sound Archive, and co-edited, with Jack Ross, a series of New Zealand poets in performance.

RAIMENT TEXT EXTRACT

In Jack’s circle, to which I belonged only as an occasional, peripheral visitor, was our Kiwi spitting image of John Lennon, ‘intellectual’ John B, who so often was there on one of the laid-out mattresses in the huge wooden-floored living room of the house at the end of Akiraho Street, which Jack S had simply occupied as a squatter. Out would come the drugs — usually marijuana, sometimes hashish — and Jack and John and any bearded or long-haired friends would gather and while away an afternoon, smoking and sometimes, especially John, imparting the great wisdoms of life to lesser beings, the hangers-on.

On an empty wall in their squat someone had scrawled Madness is infinite perception. It troubled me. Did I have to go mad to be able to perceive the real truths about life? Are there any to perceive? Must I take drugs to raise my consciousness even though the Philosophy School had strictly advised against it?

Anne and Jack themselves lived in a spacious flat near the top of Parnell Rise, behind and across the top of the street from Parnell Library, with a view downhill over the colonial wooden houses to the harbour and the wharves with their containers and container ships and the sea. I supposed he paid for the rent for his little family by dealing drugs, as he never seemed to have a job, as she did with her cafeteria one. I once even lay down beside him on their bed, listening to his philosophising, marvelling at his insouciance and soft brown curls, thinking, I oughtn’t be there in Anne’s place. She doesn’t mind, he’d protest mildly, smilingly. I’ve trained her not to mind. Which made her sound like the disciple I was being turned into.

‘An important testament to the history of New Zealand literature’
CATHIE DUNSFDOR, NEWSROOM
A short memoir that unpacks a family story that was never told: that a farm in Taranaki on which the family’s generations-long fortunes rested had been directly taken from the people of Parikaha and given to an ancestor, a member of the Armed Constabulary, following the invasion of the village during the New Zealand Wars. Beautifully written, and intertwined with an examination of the authors’ relationship with his father and of his family’s proud Catholicism, not only is this book a fine piece of writing but its key focus is also highly pertinent: How Pākehā New Zealanders should wrestle with, and own, their colonial past.

'A fresh and exciting approach to the history of Aotearoa New Zealand'
PAUL DIAMOND, NEW ZEALAND LISTENER

It is not as if I am sending stories of these three men out into the void, because of course there have long been family tales that frame each of them. Andrew the armed constable-turned-farmer, Dick the scholarly prodigy, Bob the orphan who had a family. But — and this is especially so with Andrew — these accounts are muted and often incomplete. Details are left out, forgotten or unaccounted for.

This book is my attempt to fill in some of the silences that surround these men, and in doing so to better understand things that I am still trying to figure out for myself. Fathers, sons, land and lies. My own past, present and possible futures.

None of this is straightforward and much of it is fraught, because it entails interfering with family stories. These kinds of stories matter, for it is through their telling and retelling that we remember ourselves and ‘keep alive those who only live now in the telling’.6 That is the purpose of families’ narratives: to give shape and coherence to things, and to launch memories of the past out into the future. They are both of a family and also outside of it.

But family stories can also be dangerous — far from anodyne and never neutral. They are a sort of public property: some are more or less sacrosanct, while others are battle sites, fiercely contested. These you tangle with at your peril.
In 1998, just as South Island iwi Ngāi Tahu was about to sign its Treaty of Waitangi settlement with the government — justice of sorts after seven generations of seeking redress — a former foundryman stepped into the role of kaiwhakahaere of Te Rūnanga o Ngāi Tahu, the tribal council of Ngāi Tahu. Mark Solomon stood at the head of his iwi at a pivotal moment and can be credited with the astute stewardship of the settlement that has today made Ngāi Tahu a major player in the economy and given it long-awaited self-determination.

Māori have an important role to play in this country and our country’s collective outlook is definitely changing. It is cool to be Māori these days. The early settlers tried to wipe out Māori; when that didn’t work, the goal was to assimilate us, and that didn’t work either. Now there is a renewed pride in being Māori. To be Māori these days and to know your culture, your language and your whakapapa gives you mana. I know who I am and where I came from; it engenders pride and it is a step forward from the intergenerational hardships our tīpuna had to deal with. There are definitely more opportunities for our rangatahi now.

Even though I am what I would describe as an iwi fundamentalist, a common misconception of the Māori economy is that it is driven by iwi or tribes, when a lot of it comes from whānau and hapū. There have been various estimates of the Māori economy but it is generally thought to be worth $68 billion, and growing faster than the overall economy of Aotearoa. This gives Māori an advantage they didn’t have previously, but the overall benefit of being Māori is more than a simple economic equation; it’s in our sense of connection, with each other and with nature and our long-term view.

The part Māori will play in the future of this country will depend on values and good leadership. In my eyes, good leadership is simple. It is about being honest and authentic, and valuing and listening to people. Those are the values I learnt early on, and I have tried to stay true to them throughout my life.

Traditional navigators of Te Moana-nui-a-Kiwa

JEFF EVANS

Ten navigators from Aotearoa New Zealand, the Cook Islands and Hawai`i share the challenges and triumphs of traditional wayfinding based on the deep knowledge of legendary navigator Mau Piailug. They also discuss the significance of receiving the title of Pwo (master navigator) from Piailug, and the responsibilities that come with that position. Their stories are intertwined with the renaissance of knowledge and traditions around open-ocean voyaging that proved that the exploration and settlement of the Eastern Pacific was deliberate, and one of the greatest feats of navigation in human history.

JEFF EVANS is a writer and photographer based in Auckland. He has written several books relating to waka, including Ngā Waka o Neherā, Polynesian Navigation and the Discovery of New Zealand and Waka Taua: The Maori War Canoe. His most recent book was Heke-nukumai-nga-twi Busby: Not Here by Chance (Huia, 2015).

Tree of Strangers
BARBARA SUMNER

Like many adopted people, filmmaker Barbara Sumner yearned to know who her mother was. Remarkable, moving and beautifully written, Tree of Strangers is a gripping account of a search for identity in a country governed by adoption laws that deny the rights of the adopted person.

BARBARA SUMNER has had a long career in film, television and journalism. She now runs the film production company Cloud South Pictures with her husband, Tom Burstyn. She has produced three feature documentaries, a number of television commercials and instructional films. In 2009, This Way of Life, their documentary movie about a family living simply in the Ruahine Ranges, won awards at film festivals around the world. ‘I’m replying to your letter,’ Jeannie said in her deep voice. ‘At first I thought, how ridiculous. It happened to so many girls I knew.’ She drew breath and I was sure she was smoking. ‘To be honest, I threw your letter away. But something woke me in the night and I thought: That’s Pamela’s girl. Has to be. The likeness is uncanny.’

My chest tightened. Pamela. Her name is Pamela.

‘I got up and drove to my office and saved it from the bin as the cleaners came through.’

I had the impression Jeannie was tall, imposing. The kind of woman everyone noticed. She explained she’d taken months to call because she’d been researching. She’d lost touch with Pamela but found Fred, Pamela’s father, living in Waikanae. He remembered the name of the doctor in Napier.

When Jeannie was sure, she’d called Pam in Madrid. Just the word conjured something in me. Madrid. Spain. The opposite of coal-town Runanga with its shuttered mine, roaming dogs and born-again Christians.

‘It’s remarkable, spooky even,’ Jeannie laughed. ‘You writing to me, and me knowing your mother.’

‘You know my mother.’ More wonder than question. My mouth was dry.

‘I do. Or at least, I did. You look so like her.’

I’d never felt so tired. ‘What should I do now?’

‘No need for nerves. Write a letter and send a photo.’

‘To Spain?’ The idea of mailing a letter from Runanga to Madrid felt impossible. I took down Pamela’s address.

‘I’ll give your letter time to get there, and call Pam back, see if we can arrange a meeting.’

I pressed my forehead to the cold window. Bruce’s reading light reflected a bright spot against the native bush that enclosed us. I put down the phone and said nothing.

A memoir
KEITH OVENDEN

Keith Ovenden’s urbane and clever memoir focuses on the early period of his marriage to Helen Sutch, during which time her father, the more famous and controversial Bill, was an enormously significant national figure. It carries on through Sutch’s trial on charges of spying for the Russians and his death. It is an unusual, distinctive and beautifully crafted book.

HOLLY WALKER, KETE BOOKS

Bill certainly saw an enemy out there in the world at large, but the one I eventually detected was not Britain, or America or any other bogey of the political left, but those of his fellow New Zealanders who still called England ‘home’ and sought to perpetuate what he thought of as colonial arrangements. If you could name a single person emblematic of his intellectual distaste it would be Frank Milner, ‘The Man’, the ‘eloquent protagonist of the Imperial idea’ — fellow of the Royal Empire Society, rector of Waitaki Boys’ High School, Ōamaru, for nearly 40 years and a tireless propagandist for the imperial ideal.

This was rather heady stuff: a danger to intellectuals, especially when young, as I was when I first encountered it. Helen had tried to prepare me before we arrived in Wellington but I had to learn it for myself. Bill was a figure. He was talked about. There was gossip and argument. He rubbed some people up the wrong way, could be abrasive and intolerant. He seduced others with his power of argument, its forecasts and insights, his charm. He seemed to overwhelm just about everybody with the speed of his output. Bill was a great puzzle. People were in awe of him. Some of these same people may have detested him too, but would never say so publicly. Somehow he had become a sort of law unto himself. Being related to him by marriage meant that others were inquisitive. It was hard to disguise my lack of enthusiasm, especially as it also became clear that Bill could be kind and collegial, generous in praise, thoughtful in criticism, affectionate in his attentions.

This new approach is a challenge to the notion that land, which endures forever, can be owned by those who don’t live forever. Looked at from that perspective, what is now called ownership is really a licence to occupy and use land for a while. We pass but the land endures. I like the saying: ‘You don’t inherit land from your forebears, you borrow it from your successors.’ That philosophy imposes a real obligation on the current generation to protect and nurture what is really only borrowed. And it’s a powerful argument to protect our environment.

The Urewera settlement attracted attention across the world. A few countries, including India and Canada, have adopted similar concepts and approaches, but once again New Zealand has taken the lead. I was appointed a Crown member of the Urewera Board when it was established, and I enjoy the challenge of working with fellow board members on developing this new approach.

I was also a member of a group chaired by former Māori Party co-leader Tariana Turia to explore and recommend what the government might do to assist the village of Parihaka to update its infrastructure and facilities. Again for me this was stimulating but it was also sad. The work required you to reflect on what a different New Zealand we could have had if we had adopted the philosophy of the leaders of Parihaka that there was enough for all to share. I am reflecting on whether the upheaval caused by Covid-19 will encourage people to seek a new way forward, different from conventional orthodox economics. Certainly we can’t go back to old thinking.
In New Zealand in the 1950s it was very expensive to make a telephone call from one part of the country to another. Toll calls, we called them. And the price of making a telephone call to another country in those years was prohibitive. It cost £1 per minute when I first arrived in London to telephone, or to be telephoned from, New Zealand, and I was living on about £5 per week. I was a student at the Royal Academy of Dramatic Art and my £5 per week had to cover rent and board and tube fares and tomato soup for lunch. So I kept in touch with friends and family by letter (and got into the habit of sticking their photographs on the walls of wherever I was living).

But one of the New Zealand telephone operators I had got to know earlier when I was ‘sent away to the South Island’ — a euphemism in those days for pregnant unmarried girls being dealt with, although in this case I was simply being sent away to the South Island — told me that the overseas operators (who connected calls manually in those long-ago days) had to stay on the line to make sure the connection was not lost. An agreement had to be made with the operator beforehand as to how long the call would be: it was conventionally three minutes. And as these expensive phone calls were almost always made only when it was a matter of life, or death, or heartbreak, the listening New Zealand operators — who had to interrupt to say, ‘I’m sorry but your time is up’ — were informally permitted to allow, as well as the three minutes, one minute crying time.

Today, with certain twenty-first-century technological and financial arrangements, I can phone for as long as I like from or to either country, and am permitted to cry — or laugh (hopefully without anyone listening in, though who knows) — for free.
Song for Rosaleen

PIP DESMOND

A beautifully crafted portrait of a family coping with their mother’s dementia, this book is both a celebration of Rosaleen Desmond’s life and an unflinching account of the practical and ethical dilemmas that faced her six children. Told with love, insight and humour, it raises important questions about who we become when our memories fail.

PIP DESMOND is a Wellington writer, editor and oral historian. She is the author of the award-winning Trust: A True Story of Women and Gangs and The War That Never Ended: New Zealand Veterans Remember Korea. Pip has an MA in creative writing and runs communications company 2Write with her husband Pat. They have three children and four beautiful grandchildren.

‘It should be essential reading for everyone who works in health’
SUE WOOTTON, CORPUS

SONG FOR ROSALEEN TEXT EXTRACT

Up close, over two days, we saw the extent of Mum’s confusion that she’d managed to conceal when we simply popped in. If she came across us in a room, she greeted us as if we’d just arrived. She muddled her medication, asked stock questions over and over again, lost track of the conversation, opened Live Bodies at the same page every time.

Later, I asked Rose what she remembered about that weekend. ‘You were cross,’ she said. Our family aren’t yellers and screamers. We don’t usually slam doors or throw things; we rarely even raise our voices. What we do is get brisk and tight-lipped. We get cross.

Rose was right. I’d wanted to be at the beach. Swing through the sand dunes with a bottle of wine and watch the sun go down. Smell the salt in the air. Feel the surf scour my skin. We’d had family holidays at Waikanae since we were tots — the sight of Kāpiti Island still gives me goose bumps — although eventually Mum got tired of entertaining hordes of Wellingtonians within arm’s-length of her hospitality, and insisted on holidaying further afield.

Now we couldn’t leave her on her own. We took it in turns to escape into the town belt behind Colville Street. Up there it was cool and quiet where below there was nothing but heat and clamour. The pine needles were slippery underfoot; grey slivers of harbour glinted through the spindly tree trunks. My racing heart slowed as I hauled each breath over the rock in my chest. I wanted to hide forever, free from the ties and obligations of family. I wasn’t cross any more, I was desolate. Something was wrong with our mother.
Dear Oliver

Peter Wells’ family experienced the war against Te Kooti, the Boer War, the Napier earthquake of 1931 and the Depression. By digging deep into their stories, examining letters from the past and writing a letter to the future, Wells constructs a novel and striking way to view the history of Pākehā New Zealanders.

PETER WELLS (1950–2019) was a writer of fiction and non-fiction, and a writer/director in film. His first book, Dangerous Desires, won the Reed Fiction Award, the NZ Book Award, and PEN Best New Book in Prose in 1992. His memoir The Long Loop Home won the 2002 Montana NZ Book Award for Biography, and he won many awards for his work as a film director. He was co-founder of the Auckland Writers and Readers Festival.

I began to form the idea of writing a book based on what these letters could tell us about the past. Part of living in digital time is that we’ve been robbed of a sense of chronology. There is simply the relevant now and the irrelevant past. Yet physically, psychologically, we are still subject to chronology — we are young, we grow old. And as you grow old, increasingly you look back. The past, which seemed at one time boring or incomprehensible, silently shifts into a shape that begins to make sense. You realise how you misunderstood things, how you didn’t know vital pieces of information about your parents’ lives, their childhoods, even their emotional states. The same goes for all the generations before. You are not only who you are — the unique genetic experiment that is a one-off — but you are also a composite of all the generations that went before. The past speaks through us.

I put the letters into some form of chronological order and decided I would write a book about my family. This is, I thought, what we do when, strictly speaking, we no longer have a family. We conjure one out of the past. This is not so strange. It’s how the past is redefined, after all. We walk back into the past and recognise things we overlooked in our urgency to keep moving ahead.
A Nurse on the Edge of the Desert

ANDREW CAMERON

International humanitarian-aid nurse and New Zealander Andrew Cameron is the winner of the coveted Florence Nightingale Medal. In this gripping book, he recounts his remarkable life nursing in some of the world’s most dangerous and challenging locations.

ANDREW CAMERON grew up in the Hawke's Bay, New Zealand, and came to nursing after several years working a range of jobs. When not working in a war-zone or postconflict-zone, he is the sole medical practitioner in Birdsville, Australia, on the edge of the Simpson Desert and home of the famous Birdsville races. He is the recipient of the Florence Nightingale Medal.

LORRAINE RITCHIE, CORPUS

Then it all got far worse. In February, a convoy on its way to deliver aid to the north of the country, which had been blanketed by heavy snowfalls, was ambushed. Six ICRC workers were killed and another two went missing, presumed abducted. It was a bad sign, given that this was considered to be a relatively safe part of Afghanistan. All Red Cross activities were suspended, and many of us were withdrawn to Kabul and confined to barracks.

About mid-morning on 8 March, we heard a dull thump and then the unmistakable rattle of automatic gunfire close by our office complex, details of which I cannot give but the media covered.

Half a world away, in a high school in Germany, a teacher asked the social studies class: 'Does anyone know what terrible tragedy happened yesterday in Afghanistan?' After a few moments when no hands were raised, a teenager named Josi Cameron gingerly raised hers and gave a full account of the story, in quite some detail.

'How do you know all this, Josi?' the teacher asked.

'Oh, my dad was only 200 metres away, safe behind steel doors, throughout the whole incident,' she replied.

After a few days I had my marching orders. I was off to wait in the far safer Tajikistan.

And so here I am. It's Monday, so it must be Dushanbe — which takes its name from the market that used to happen here every Monday. Who knows where I will be a week, a month, a year from now? In some ways, it hardly matters. As long as I can see a way of improving the lot of humanity — no matter how undeserving it seems, at times — even just a small amount, I'll be happy there. It will seem like home.
As I stepped up on to the small ice platform on the summit I was enveloped in the most intense wave of excitement that I had ever experienced. It felt as if the world had fallen away around me. Sheer faces and enormous peaks surrounded me. Never had I felt so alive, never had I been so astounded by a view. The sense of height and the scale of the mountains was absolutely exhilarating.

‘Woohoo!’ I screamed. There were no other words to describe the moment. ‘We made it, Pasang!’ I shouted, both my arms in the air. ‘Wow! Well done!’

I looked around, at the stunning tooth-like peak of Ama Dablam, to Baruntse, and then to distant Makalu. I turned, and there was the gentle pyramid of Lhotse Shar, and then the overwhelming mass of Lhotse and Nuptse, rising like a cresting wave above us.

‘Woohoo!’ I screamed again. ‘This is amazing!’

‘Five forty-five, which means it takes —’ Pasang started to count on his fingers — ‘two, three, four, five. Four hours and half. Quite fast, we are.’

‘Wow!’ Normally it takes climbers between seven and nine hours to summit.

‘This is amazing!’ I laughed, blown away by our speed, and the fact that I had made it. I had so enjoyed the morning that summiting seemed like an unexpected bonus, a surprise. I just could not get over it. Words failed me.

‘Unbelievable,’ I said under my breath, then I just stood in dumbfounded silence, admiring the view.

The sun began to light the edges of Lhotse, lacing it with gold. I turned round again and watched the light catch the top of Ama Dablam, warm rays working their way down the face.

'A must-read for any boy who is in need of such an anthem'
NEW ZEALAND HERALD

I thought all my internal organs — heart, liver, lungs, all the curly piping and soft shapes and lumps — would become visible on my outside. And . . . weirdest feeling: you could fry me! Fry the vegetarian! Garth in the kitchen at Pete’s could slice me with his precious knives and set me sizzling in a pan. All my bits tightening on the heat, browning and spitting. Why not? All of us were returning eventually to . . .

Keri’s mouth was close to my ear. It was easier to hear now. Quiet almost. ‘Isn’t this, you know, beautiful? Isn’t it?’

I’d had my eyes closed. They opened, as if by themselves. Finally, I looked around. I looked down.

‘Yes,’ I said. I nodded. ‘Yes.’

We were circling above the lake, swinging gently in the air, now with a view back to our township.

We could see the marquee tents of the fair and the lakefront road with a long line of traffic. Farther back, the brown scars in the land where the big development was going in, shapes that must have been bulldozers, diggers. The shiny silver rectangles of the new supermarket and the recreation centre. The green of the golf course, the sandy eyes of the bunkers. Rows of roofs. Trees. The small people, getting smaller.

Keri said, ‘Is this how we look to you?’

‘Welcome to my world,’ I said.

Hazel and the Snails

NAN BLANCHARD

Six-year-old Hazel tends her colony of shoebox snails while observing, with varying degrees of understanding, her father’s illness and final decline. Impending loss forms the heart of this story, but it’s charming and funny, too. Nan Blanchard’s assured eye is a rare quality in a new writer; seldom has the world of a young child been so delicately or acutely observed. This is a debut novel destined to become a classic.

NAN BLANCHARD is a counsellor who also teaches in the Counselling and Guidance Programmes at the Institute of Education, Massey University. She lives in Wellington. Hazel and the Snails is her first novel for young readers.

A gentle story from a first-time author, told with heart and presented with quirky visual treats

THE SAPLING

After school, Hazel and Gran waited at the bus stop. They were off to the library. Gran held the bag of library books, and Hazel held the snail box.

It was windy. Hazel rested her chin on the lid of the box so the wind wouldn’t snatch it. Gran held on to her glasses. Once, when it had been really windy, Gran’s glasses had blown off her face and scuttled along the footpath like a crab. Gran had chased the crab glasses. One of the arms fell off, and the tiny screw that fastened it rolled into the gutter and disappeared forever. Gran wore her glasses home with only one arm. They kept slipping sideways.

‘One-armed glasses give one a drunken view of the world,’ said Gran. ‘Most disconcerting. Unless, of course,’ she added, ‘a drunken view of the world is what one is aiming for.’

Since then, Hazel had often aimed for a drunken view of the world. She aimed for it right now, turning her head so her cheek rested on the snail box. The world tilted, and the glittering orange squares on Gran’s skirt turned into diamonds, wiggling in the wind. Hazel blinked and licked the snail lid.

‘Now you’ve got felt pen on your tongue,’ said Gran.

The bus swooped towards them like a giant metal bird, yellow and black and shining. It braked with a long, loud screech. Hazel jumped back.

The doors opened with a hot hiss, and a man leapt out. There was a mini Lego figure on his t-shirt.

‘Thanks, driver,’ he called. He raised his eyebrows at Gran and Hazel as he walked past. That was his hello, Hazel thought.

Gran let Hazel go first. The driver grinned at her. He was made of hair. Hair on his face, hair in his ears, hair up his nose, and a whole ruff of hair poking up from under his shirt collar. Even his hand was hairy. It looked like a paw.

The world is full of gorillas, thought Hazel.

EDUCATION
Creating New Synergies

EDITED BY MASAYOSHI OGINO, PENELope SHINO AND DALLAS NESBITT

Compiled under the aegis of Japanese Studies Aotearoa New Zealand, this collection invites us into the reality of modern Japanese language teaching in New Zealand’s universities and tertiary institutions. The volume also aims to motivate stakeholders with a vested interest in New Zealand’s relationship with Japan to consider how they, too, might play a role in promoting Japanese studies.

Dr Masayoshi OginO has extensive experience in language teaching in both New Zealand and overseas at secondary and tertiary levels. He has an MPhil in Japanese Language Education and a PhD in Applied Linguistics.

Dr Penny Shino is the coordinator of the Japanese Programme at Massey University’s School of Humanities.

Dallas Nesbitt is a senior lecturer in Japanese at AUT University. Her research focuses on Kanji teaching and learning Japanese katakana script.

No book has ever been published on tertiary Japanese language education in New Zealand, so this is the very first and a pioneering book in that regard. The individual chapters by educators at the forefront of Japanese language teaching in New Zealand present innovative research, teaching strategies and practices, and explore practical ways of securing a healthy future for Japanese language education under the theme ‘creating new synergies’. The dialogue and collaboration that took place in the completion of this project have also created new synergies.

There are countries and regions which share similar issues and concerns to those we are dealing with in New Zealand, not least the decreasing number of learners of Japanese. Our approaches could be useful to them, and to other countries and regions that may face similar issues in the near future.

Our vision and hope is that this project will not finish with the publication of this book, but that it will inspire renewed interest in and new conversations about Japan and Japanese among educators and policymakers in New Zealand and beyond.
Fundamentals of Finance
Fourth Edition
ANDREA BENNETT, JENNY PARRY AND CAROLYN WIRTH

This fourth revised and updated edition gives a practical overview of contemporary finance from a New Zealand perspective. Broad in scope, Fundamentals of Finance explains the important financial decisions made by businesses and individuals, and how these decisions are influenced by the financial environment in which we live and work.

ANDREA BENNETT is a senior tutor in Massey's School of Business. Her research focuses on financial systems, financial literacy, investments and financial planning.

JENNY PARRY is a former senior lecturer in the Department of Finance, Banking and Property at Massey University, and is now a self-employed consultant in investments and personal financial planning.

CAROLYN WIRTH holds a PhD in Finance from Massey University for empirical research on the capital market implications of resource consent information contained in New Zealand listed company announcements.

PUBLISHED: December 2016
ISBN: 9780994132529
Limpbound, 250 x 195mm. 320 pages. $75

Fundamentals of Finance provides a unique overview of contemporary finance from an Australasian perspective. We introduce the fundamental tools, techniques and concepts used in finance, then apply them to three major sectors of finance:

- financial institutions and markets
- personal finance
- business finance.

The broad coverage reflects the impact which finance has upon the economy, businesses and individuals, and allows for a more complete perspective of finance than traditional introductory finance textbooks have offered.

Fundamentals of Finance has a strong practical orientation and provides both a suitable foundation for further finance study and an overview for those students who simply want an introduction to finance. The book is divided into four parts:

- Part 1 assists the reader to understand financial markets and the institutions that operate within them. This provides readers with a foundation upon which to build a more complete understanding of how financial markets assist the flow of funds between individuals and business organisations.
- Part 2 covers the tools, techniques and concepts used in finance. These chapters provide the methodology for applications introduced throughout the book.
- Part 3 explains the concepts of risk and return, and introduces personal financial management techniques that can assist readers to achieve their own financial goals.
- Part 4 describes a business organisation, how it is managed and financed, and its short-term and long-term operating strategies. Upon reaching the final chapter, the reader will realise that many of the techniques used to achieve personal financial goals are also used by business organisations.
Becoming Aotearoa
A new history of New Zealand
MICHAEL BELGRAVE

In the first major national history of Aotearoa New Zealand to be published for 20 years, Professor Michael Belgrave advances the notion that New Zealand’s two peoples — tangata whenua and subsequent migrants — have together built an open, liberal society based on a series of social contracts. Frayed though they may sometimes be, these contracts have created a country that is distinct. This engaging new look at our history examines how.

MICHAEL BELGRAVE is Professor Emeritus of History at Massey University. He has published widely on treaty and Māori history, and has worked in advisory groups supporting the implementation of the new national history curriculum.

If the Treaty introduced liberal ideas of rights and responsibilities and the Crown’s relationship to Māori, the New Zealand Company did the same, not just in the determination of settlers for self-government, but also in the contractual relationship between the company and its labourers, and the promises of guaranteed employment. Eight hours’ work, eight hours’ sleep and eight hours’ play was not simply a statement of worker rights; it defined a contractual relationship between employer and employee. The dominant role of assisted migration schemes in the great expansion of New Zealand’s white population from the late 1860s was, again, based on contracts. That assisted migration focused on family groups — parents with young children — reinforced the state’s responsibility to immigrants as family units.

When the economy collapsed in the 1880s, as it did worldwide, new ideas about socialism, the rights of women, the nature of the family and the role of the state challenged and restated earlier assumptions of state responsibility. Then, through the 1890s, the Liberals reformed the relationship between the state and Māori, the state and working people, the state and women in the family, the state and the environment and the economy, and even attempted to reshape the relationship between the New Zealand state and the South Pacific world.

In sustaining these social relationships after the First World War, the government finally closed the door on the open movement of people that had been so essential to the colony’s nineteenth-century growth. An increasing sense of biological and British exclusiveness sustained these social contracts right through to the 1970s, when they were challenged by new social movements, by the second wave of feminism and the changing nature of the family, by a new environmental awareness and by the revival of Māori protest.
The Near West
A history of Grey Lynn, Arch Hill and Westmere
TANIA MACE

From the eeling ground of mana whenua and its colonial carve-up into farmland to the gradual progression of residential development through Victorian and Edwardian times and beyond, history is everywhere in ‘The People’s Republic of Grey Lynn’.

Through early industry, the rough and tumble of left-wing politics, the wave of post war migrants from rural Māori communities and the Pacific, and the boho scene of artists, this comprehensive, engaging and richly illustrated history of Grey Lynn and its neighbours Arch Hill and Westmere surveys it all.

TANIA MACE is an historian and researcher who mostly works in the area of heritage assessments. She has lived in Grey Lynn all her adult life.

Grid
The life and times of First World War fighter ace Keith Caldwell

ADAM CLAASEN

This gripping biography of Air Commodore Keith ‘Grid’ Caldwell CBE, MC, DFC & bar, Croix de guerre, tells the story of his remarkable exploits during the First World War. Written by a leading military historian, Grid details Caldwell’s journey from early flight training in Auckland to his death-defying sorties over enemy lines on the Western Front. It also details his pivotal role in sustaining military aviation in interwar New Zealand, and his role in reinvigorating interest in the airmen of the First World War during the 1960s and 1970s.

ADAM CLAASEN is a senior lecturer in history at Massey University. He has presented conference papers and published articles in scholarly journals on military intelligence, the Luftwaffe, general airpower and geo-strategy in war.

After Richard Shaw published his acclaimed memoir The Forgotten Coast in 2021, he made contact with Pākehā with long settler histories who were coming to grips with the truth of their respective families’ ‘pioneer stories’. They were questioning the foundation of aggressive acts of colonisation and land confiscation on which those stories had been constructed.

The Unsettled weaves those stories with Shaw’s own and features New Zealanders who are trying to figure out how to live well with their own pasts, their presents and their possible futures. They may be unsettled, but they are doing something about it.

RICHARD SHAW is a professor of politics at Massey University’s College of Humanities and Social Sciences. His heart increasingly lies in the historical and emotional territories explored both in this and his 2021 book, The Forgotten Coast.

There is a photo, a little dusty now, sitting on a shelf in my mother’s house. It competes for space with the novels of Damon Runyon and Niall Williams, my father’s favourite authors. Dad is dead now, gone these past 10 years. There are photos of him on the shelf, too. But the one that was at the start of it all is of another man from another time. He is standing with a group of sternlooking, formidable men, gazing out across the years. In the centre, taller than the others, he is holding a ball. The man on his right has a bandaged head. They are all wearing big, heavy boots, laces wrapped tightly around their ankles. Behind them you can just see the hindquarters of a horse.

The photo was taken in 1881 at the Rahotu Domain, just a few kilometres away from Parihaka pa. The men are members of the Armed Constabulary Coastal rugby team. The big man’s name was Andrew Gilhooly. He was the captain of the team, and my great-grandfather.

I walked past that photo many times over the decades, looking at it without seeing it. Then Dad died, wheels fell off here and there, and things that I had not really seen before began to slide into focus. That photo was one of them. It is a small thing, this image, but it sits in the context of some very big things. The year, the place, the people — they hint at what is to come. But it took me until my mid-fifties to even start asking the right questions of the photo. What does it have to say about my past? How did I manage, for so long, to miss the story it so obviously tells? What does this all mean for me today? That last one, in particular, is giving me no end of trouble.

And as it turns out, I am not the only person in this country asking it. The circumstances that give rise to the query differ from person to person, as do the responses, but the question itself does not. Neither does it go away if you try to avoid it. It is always there. Waiting.

‘This small but potent book will foster different conversations about the past and its connection with the present’

Published to mark 100 years since the establishment of the famous Alexander Turnbull Library, one of New Zealand’s great storehouses, this energetic, comprehensive book approaches the history of Aotearoa New Zealand through 101 remarkable objects. Each tells a story, be it of discovery, courage, dispossession, conflict, invention, creation, or conservation. The objects range from letters and paintings to journals, photographs, posters, banners and books. The place each has in the patchwork of the narrative creates a vivid overall view of the people of this place and the unique histories they have made together.

‘Here is a wunderkammer of a book, a cabinet of curiosities with something delightful and diverting on every page’
PAUL LITTLE, NORTH & SOUTH
Hard by the Cloud House

PETER WALKER

The legend of Pouakai, aka the extinct Haast’s Eagle, takes Peter Walker on a journey from an 1860s Canterbury sheep run to a deep cave near Karamea as he learns the story of the mighty hunter that inhabited a peak in the foothills of the Southern Alps. Was it the same creature as the Rukh of Arabic legends? And, if so, was that evidence that in the twelfth century Arabic and Chinese explorers ventured as far as the South Pacific, saw Pouakai, and traded with Māori?

PETER WALKER is a New Zealand journalist and author of acclaimed historical memoir The Fox Boy (Bloomsbury 2001), novel The Courier’s Tale (Bloomsbury 2010) and Some Here Among Us (Bloomsbury 2015). In 2011 he was the Randell Cottage fellow. He now lives in the Far North.

NEW ZEALAND LISTENER

Late one afternoon in March 1860 a man in a thin green velveteen jacket and a wide-awake hat arrived on foot at a sheep station named Glenmark, about 65 kilometres north of Christchurch. The man was in his mid-fifties but he looked older. Several people who met him that day agreed later that he looked ‘careworn’, although they could not agree whether his corduroy trousers were patched or not. Earlier in the day he was given a glass of ale by the landlord of the Kōwai pub, 25 kilometres south of Glenmark, and then, after watching him closely, the landlord sent out another ale and a free meal.

The man, whose name was Henry Davis, took to the road again. For a few miles he got a ride on a passing wagon. By mid-afternoon the wind began to blow and rain could be seen whitening in the foothills to the south. As Davis walked towards the farm house at Glenmark, about a mile from the road, rain began falling and he encountered the manager and 12 part-owner of the station coming from the stockyards. With a piercing gaze, tall, handsome — when he was 80 he was still ‘slim as a youngster and straight as a gun barrel’, a neighbour recalled — George Moore was already one of the richest men in the colony. He saw the stranger and stopped.

‘What do you want?’
‘I’m looking for work.’

For a man to turn up at a remote station asking for work was well within the normal run of things. The population of the new colony of Canterbury was small, the roads few and the nights very dark. By 1860 there was a little army of swagmen walking from place to place looking for work and, if there was no work available, for shelter and food. It was regarded as a plain duty to provide these. Obituaries for wealthy men often included the sentence ‘No swagman was ever turned away’.

Haunting and searingly beautiful, Erebus is a volcano like no other. It has attracted explorers, adventurers, artists, sightseers and scientists, each drawn to the mountain by their own particular vision or curiosity. Ngātokimatawhaorua, the longest waka taua to be built in modern times, is a national taonga and resides at the Treaty Grounds at Waitangi. The inspiration for its construction came from Te Puea Hērangi’s dream to build seven waka for the 1940 centennial commemorations of the signing of the Treaty of Waitangi. But it was to be many decades before the true power of this mighty waka taua was realised. The story of Ngātokimatawhaorua, and those who carved and crewed it, is a fascinating window into te ao Māori and the revival of waka and carving traditions in Aotearoa.

JEFF EVANS is a writer and photographer based in Auckland. He has written several books relating to waka, including Ngā Waka o Neherā, Polynesian Navigation and the Discovery of New Zealand and Waka Taua: The Maori War Canoe. ‘An in-depth account of this important and little-known part of New Zealand history.’
JOHN DALY-PEOPLES, NEW ZEALAND ARTS REVIEW

Ngāpuhi heartland, October 1937. Rānui Maupakanga, possibly the last master waka builder of his generation and by then in his seventies, enters Puketi Forest. Heir to the skills and knowledge required to build waka taua, he will prove to be a vital link to the tohunga tārai waka of years gone by. He will also be a key figure in the revival of the Māori war canoe.

Born in the small settlement of Hauturu near the eastern shores of the Kawhia Harbour, Maupakanga is solidly built, his face oval and his eyes deep set. A wide moustache covers his upper lip. He has a habit of wearing a short-sleeved bush shirt over his woollen jumper, and on sunny days a well-worn fedora and a pair of round-framed sunglasses complete the picture. He has made the long trip north into Ngāpuhi territory from Waikato, at the request of Te Puea Hērangi, to oversee the building of a massive waka taua.

At a planned 120 feet (35.7 metres) long and about 6 feet (2 metres) wide, the waka will be the largest ever built. It will represent northern Māori during the 1940 centennial commemoration of the signing of the Treaty of Waitangi. Maupakanga is in the forest to locate a pair of kauri trees suitable for the task. Stands of the tree dot the forest, but his challenge is to find two large enough to meet Te Puea’s requirements. Even with the help of knowledgeable local guides, the search takes him a full two weeks.
Shadow Worlds
A history of the occult and esoteric in New Zealand
ANDREW PAUL WOOD

It’s hard to imagine the notion that daily life in New Zealand was narrow, conservative, unimaginative and stolid given the vigorous strand of interest in the occult, the spooky and the mysterious that has been part of our history since 1840. This book takes a lively scan including across communicating with spirits, secret ritualistic societies, the supernatural, the New Age — everything from The Golden Dawn and Rosicrucianism to Spiritualism, witchcraft and Radiant Living — and introduces the reader to a cast of fascinating characters who were generally true believers and sometimes con artists. It’s a fresh and novel take on the history of a small colonial society that was not quite as ploddingly conformist as we may have imagined.

ANDREW PAUL WOOD is one of Aotearoa New Zealand’s leading writers on matters art-historical and aesthetic. His work has appeared in publications in New Zealand, Australia, the UK, Europe and the US.

Not surprisingly, Theosophy proved popular in Britain, given India was very much the prize jewel in Queen Victoria’s imperial crown. As they wrestled with their own conflicting cultural mix of rational materialism and the limitations of modern Christianity, Victorians became fascinated by Eastern spiritualism, with its emphasis on karma, samsara (reincarnation) and nirvana, and its more relaxed attitudes to sexuality. Nor did Theosophy require one to give up one’s customary creed and convert to another.

The movement spread through the Empire via the agency of ‘wealthy international travellers with an interest in the occult and esotericism’. New Zealand in the 1890s was no exception, and had the added attractions of being closer to India and being home to Māori culture. From the 1870s onwards the English poet, Spiritualist, Egyptologist and Theosophist Gerald Massey (1828–1907), putting one in mind of Casaubon in George Eliot’s Middlemarch, attempted to link Māori spiritual beliefs to Egyptian lore and Jewish Kabbalah in his epic comparative studies of world mythology.

Although the colonial undertones are obvious to us today, at the time such sentiments reflected a sympathy, mingled with romanticism and even envy, regarding indigenous peoples. A typical attitude is that of the British Theosophist Alfred Percy Sinnett (1840–1921), who wrote in 1883: ‘The bigotry of modern civilization . . . is to blame if the European races are at this moment more generally ignorant of the extent to which psychological [our psychical] research has been carried, than the Egyptian population of the past, or the people of India in the present day’.
The Fate of the Land
Ko ngā Ākinga a ngā Rangatira
Māori political struggle in the Liberal era 1891–1912
DANNY KEENAN

In the second half of the nineteenth century, settlers poured into Aotearoa demanding land. Millions of acres were acquired by the government or directly by settlers or confiscated after the Land Wars. By 1891, when the Liberal government came to power, Māori retained only a fraction of their lands. To stop further land being lost, some rangatira saw parliamentary process as the mechanism; others pursued political independence. For over two decades, Māori men and women of outstanding ability fought hard to protect their people and their land. How those rangatira fared, and how they should be remembered, is the story of Māori political struggle during the Liberal era.

DANNY KEENAN (Ngāti Te Whiti ki Te Atiawa) has a PhD in history and has published widely on Māori and New Zealand history.
Downfall
The destruction of Charles Mackay
PAUL DIAMOND

In 1920 New Zealanders were shocked by the news that the brilliant mayor of genteel Whanganui had shot a young gay poet, D’Arcy Cresswell, who was blackmailing him. They were then riveted by the trial that followed. Mackay was sentenced to hard labour and later left the country, only to be shot during street unrest in Berlin during the rise of the Nazis. Mackay had married into Whanganui high society, and the story has long been the town’s dark secret. The outcome of years of digging by historian Paul Diamond, Downfall shines a clear-eyed light on the vengeful impulses behind the blackmail and Mackay’s ruination.

'Downfall Text Extract'

In German, a Spurensuche is a search for traces, usually of forensic evidence at a crime scene, but also for traces in history. This book is my story of the search for signs of what, in 1920, was dubbed the ‘Whanganui Sensation’ — when Charles Mackay, the mayor of Whanganui, shot soldier-poet D’Arcy Cresswell.

I first read about the shooting in a 1997 anthology of gay writing, and in 2004 started work with a colleague on a radio documentary that became this book. I retraced the steps of Mackay and Cresswell, starting in ‘Pretty Prosperous and Progressive’ Whanganui — the elegant river town where the two men met. I followed Mackay to New Plymouth, site of a prison then set aside for homosexual men. I also travelled to London, where both Cresswell and Mackay lived, and visited the sites where they met other men.

Finally, I went to Berlin, to the street corner where Mackay was fatally shot in the infamous Blutmai (Bloody May) fighting in 1929. Along with newspapers and books about the 1920s, I have pored over the archival traces of both men and their families — papers, letters, photos and newspapers — in libraries and archives. I have met people whose memories stretched back to the 1920s, and listened to oral history interviews.

Along the way I have found evidence left behind by Mackay and Cresswell, what Peter Wells described as the ‘dropped hairpins’ in between the cracks, the fragments of homosexual lives that escaped self-censorship and purges by others, and tell us about same sex love at a time when it was outlawed.

Mackay and Cresswell’s lives and times build a picture of homosexual identity and help to answer the question: What was it like to be homosexual in the 1920s? Just as the Spuren or forensic samples found in a German crime scene are used solve a crime, the historical traces left by Mackay and Cresswell help us to see more clearly the contours of homosexual subcultures in an era when same-sex relations were forbidden.
One Hundred Havens
The settlement of the Marlborough Sounds

HELEN BEAGLEHOLE

The many coves of the Marlborough Sounds are some of the most beautiful places in New Zealand. History has played out here in complex ways — Māori and Pākehā, land and sea, boom and bust, locals and tourists. It’s a glorious but challenging environment and generations of farmers, miners and tourism operators, and others, have faced obstacles that range from the merely difficult to the nearly impossible. This rich and complex story is brought together in this wide-ranging and generously illustrated account of the settlement of the Sounds and its resourceful and resilient people.

My introduction to the Marlborough Sounds was in 1977 when I arrived in our first, and small, yacht from Mana. The yacht sailed at about 2½ knots and it had been a long and stormy crossing. Our small daughter and I huddled on the cramped cockpit floor, soaked with spray and being sick into the same bucket. Now and again, my husband Tim leaned over the tiller to empty the bucket overboard. Our boys, a little older, were sick, then slept below.

At last we reached the sheltered waters behind Perano Head, and then Tory Channel itself. The sun came out, we shrugged off our sodden coats — and the wash from the inter-island ferry drenched us as it smacked against the side.

That trip began my lifelong exploration of the Sounds — by boat, by bike and by foot. It lasted almost 40 years, with the two of us, with our children and with our children’s children.

Writing this history of settlement in the Sounds has taken me further into this unique environment. I knew something about Captain Cook, his visits and his relationships with the people he met, but little about other early explorers, visitors and surveyors. I was aware Sounds Māori had been tragically affected by the Waipounamu, and earlier, purchases but I knew nothing of their subsequent lives and situations.

In 1977 we were surrounded by farmland over which scrub was steadily encroaching; in other places, the play of light and shade of the bush was being obliterated by the relentless march of rows of pines. But of the story behind that bush and the creation of that landscape, I knew nothing. Researching — and writing — this book has therefore been a fascinating and moving journey.
New Zealand’s Foreign Service
A history
EDITOR BY IAN MCGIBBON

Since 1943, during war, humanitarian and natural disasters, and flashpoints of global tension, one government department has been charged with the critical role of representing New Zealand’s interests overseas. For more than 75 years, the Ministry of Foreign Affairs has been served by some remarkable people, dedicated to an organisation that has reflected New Zealand’s developing sense of nationhood and place in world. This history of the foreign service, edited by one of New Zealand’s foremost historians, captures the high stakes, skill and intelligence involved in the development of a unique organisation.

SIMON BRIDGES, NEWSROOM
From the dust of the North African deserts and the slaughter in the skies over Europe to the war at sea and in the jungles of the Pacific, the 800 images in this landmark book show New Zealanders at war during the bloodiest conflict in human history. The photographs span every battle and theatre in which New Zealanders fought. The accompanying text, by one of New Zealand’s leading military historians, places the images in context. Chapters on prisoners of war, the home front and New Zealand’s role in Japan after the end of hostilities round out this rich visual account of a conflict that dominated all aspects of New Zealand life for seven years.

Our First Foreign War
The impact of the South African War 1899–1902 on New Zealand

NIGEL ROBSON

The South African War was a chance for New Zealand to prove its military capabilities and loyalty to the Empire. There was a huge surge in nationalist feeling and intense interest in the fortunes of the imperial forces. Mafeking, Kimberley and Ladysmith became household names. Fundraising events were packed, and as men enlisted in contingents and Volunteer Corps, women and children joined patriotic groups and Cadet Corps. This is the first book to examine in detail the enduring impact of the country’s first overseas war.

NIGEL ROBSON is a senior historian at the Office of Māori Crown Relations Te Arawhiti. This, his first book, comes out of his Master’s thesis (2013) supervised by Associate Professor James Watson, Massey University.

Perhaps inevitably, New Zealand’s role in the South African War and the impact of the conflict on New Zealand society were eclipsed by the much larger global conflicts that followed. For years, the sheer enormity of the two world wars has relegated the South African War to little more than a prelude to the main events.

Our First Foreign War seeks to address this imbalance by providing new insights into a number of areas, which include: the economic impact of the war; its influence on education in New Zealand schools; the behaviour of New Zealand troops (both within New Zealand and in South Africa); the role of those who opposed New Zealand involvement; and the role of the church. The war occurred at a time when New Zealanders were continuing to develop a sense of national identity while at the same time maintaining strong imperial links. In September 1899, Seddon informed Parliament that an ‘emergency’ had arisen in South Africa, adding that ‘the occasion now exists for us to prove our devotion to the Empire’. Two weeks later, Dunedin citizens perusing their Otago Daily Times learned that hostilities had commenced in an article titled ‘War at Last’.

‘This is truly a detailed history of an unsavoury subject, the scope of which is quite remarkable’

Otago Daily Times

The sombre exhumation in Mount Eden’s main exercise yard was the first of its kind, but it may not be the last. According to former prison officer Phil Lister, the bodies of other inmates, including those who died there by suicide, illness or violence as well as by execution, may lie in the same northeast corner of the prison grounds, a spot chosen because under ancient Christian tradition it was the least sanctified and therefore the most suitable resting place for evildoers.

There can be little doubt that a penal institution that has occupied the same site for over 150 years, for much of that time with limited official oversight or regard for the rights of its inmates, must hold many strange secrets. The tight-lipped old establishment itself, at the foot of Mount Eden’s volcanic cone, is not altogether to blame for the atmosphere of mystery that cloaks it. Thousands of Aucklanders drive past its walled-in buildings every day, yet few seem to know that the prison has lain empty and unused since 2011, and almost none are aware of the influential role it has played in forming, and perhaps deforming, New Zealand’s colonial history.
Tooth and Veil
The life and times of the New Zealand dental nurse

NOEL O’HARE

Established in 1921, the School Dental Service was charged with waging war on our nation’s poor teeth. Through interviews with dental nurses from across the decades, this lively social history tells the story of the young women on the front line of this unique social experiment. Accompanied by over 150 illustrations.

NOEL O’HARE is a freelance journalist, columnist, blogger and author. He was a staff writer for the New Zealand Listener magazine, where he wrote many award-winning features. He is the author of Think Before You Swallow: The art of staying healthy in a health-obsessed world (2007) and How to Save the World by Recycling Your Sex Toys (2009).

While New Zealand soldiers dug into their trenches, major issues divided the nation back home, including conscription, censorship, and the treatment of conscientious objectors, Germans and other ‘enemy aliens’. Then, in the Great War’s last months, the influenza pandemic struck. This fresh history examines a new and uncertain Dominion at war.

‘Our first experience of total war was a mixed one and The Home Front depiction of it all is a fine addition to the WW1 library’

JIM SULLIVAN, OTAGO DAILY TIMES
The next morning Heke and Kawiti attacked the town. The flagstaff was immediately lost and the various parties of soldiers and sailors fell back on the defences at the northern end of the town under the weight of the number of Māori attackers.

Heke and Kawiti’s attack was as well planned as the defence of the town was inept. The defenders appeared to have no real plan, and once the battle began, ‘there was no proper coordination of operations in the defence: the naval authority, the military and the Police Magistrate each gave orders and acted as they saw fit, independently of the others’. The town’s defences were not well sited and they certainly did not comprise the ‘integrated main position of the northern end of the town’ claimed by Belich. Although Heke and Kawiti did not follow up their initial successes at the flagstaff and ‘Matavia’ (Matawhi) Pass by taking the town immediately, the chaos and panic among the defenders was such that by early afternoon the decision was made to abandon the town. How could such an event have happened?
Over 10,000 New Zealanders fought in the First World War in the Australian Imperial Force, with British army units, the Indian army, the Canadian Expeditionary Force, the French Foreign Legion, and other nations’ medical organisations. In this volume in the official Centenary History Programme series, Glyn Harper tells their remarkable stories for the first time.

With Them Through Hell

ANNA ROGERS

The thousands of New Zealand men who fought in the First World War went through hell; beside them was another fighting force, armed with scalpels and bandages. This beautifully illustrated book tells the remarkable story of the hundreds of medical personnel who cared for the sick and wounded, often at great personal risk.

ANNA ROGERS has spent most of her working life as a book editor. Anna also writes book reviews, adapts books for radio, and is the author of eight non-fiction books, including While You’re Away: New Zealand Nurses at War 1899–1948, A Lucky Landing: The Story of the Irish in New Zealand and illustrated histories of Canterbury and the West Coast.

The Battle for North Africa

GLYN HARPER

In the early years of the Second World War, Germany shocked the world with a devastating blitzkrieg. Leading war historian Glyn Harper dives into the story, vividly narrating the events, strategies, and personalities surrounding the battles and paying particular attention to the Second Battle of El Alamein.

GLYN HARPER is Professor of War Studies at Massey University. He is Massey University’s project manager for the Centenary History of New Zealand and the First World War. He is the author of more than 30 books on military history, including several bestsellers, and books for children.

PUBLISHED: November 2017

Hardback, 229 x 152mm. 264 pages. $45

There is no doubt that the October Alamein battle was an important turning point in the war. It marked, albeit on a smaller scale than other turning-point battles of the war, the first decisive defeat on land of an army commanded by a German general and containing panzer and infantry formations of the Wehrmacht. While Rommel’s defeated Panzerarmee contained many Italian formations, it is a myth that these units did not fight well in North Africa in the Alamein battles.

Such an important event in the history of the Second World War is always worthy of further study. It is hoped that this book will provide a fresh and unbiased perspective of a critical battle of the Second World War. The battles of Alamein, even after so many years, remain contested ground. Part of this was fueled after the war in a ‘third battle of El Alamein’, when so many of the participants published their accounts of what happened. The state of Eighth Army in early August 1942, who was responsible for success at Alam Halfa and the October battle, and how important all three battles were all still remain controversial and debated topics. As Jonathan Fennell wrote in 2011, ‘After close to seventy years of scholarship, the causes of Eighth Army’s success at El Alamein are still contested.’ It is not expected that this book will resolve these debates, although it is hoped that it adds substantially to them.

New Zealand Between the Wars
EDITED BY RACHAEL BELL

From the depths of the Great Depression to the bright promise of the Welfare State, in a series of expert chapters this book shows how the interwar decades transformed New Zealand society, setting New Zealand firmly on its modern course.

DR RACHAEL BELL is a historian teaching New Zealand social history at Massey University. Her papers include ‘New Zealand Between the Wars 1919–1939’ and ‘Radical Nation’, a survey of protest in New Zealand since the Second World War. Rachael’s research focuses on the transmission of history within the national narrative, particularly as it has occurred through government-sponsored initiatives.

PUBLISHED: October 2017

The recurring patterns of change and adjustment and the themes of modernity, state intervention, citizenship and gender are woven throughout this book in ways that enhance a feeling for and an understanding of New Zealand national life. The interwar years are significant also for laying the foundations for many scientific, social and academic disciplines and for bringing about profound changes among existing ones. Within this volume may be found the genesis of professions as diverse as social work, veterinary science and sports management, along with developments in those already established professions such as education and engineering. As such, it is hoped that it will be of use to students of many fields, not just of history, and of interest to educators and the general public alike.

The chapters do not presume an extensive historical knowledge of the period, but rather provide a broad introduction to the topics, followed in many instances by case studies that illuminate trends and provide examples. Throughout we have tried to capture the excitement and sense of growth and progress characteristic of these decades, while being attuned to the costs, both environmental and social, that such changes exacted. In doing so we present a fresh look at many aspects of New Zealand life and of a nation on the cusp.

PETER LINEHAM

Historian Peter Lineham examines Christianity in New Zealand through the lens of cultural development and asks: If the various denominations and faiths set out to shape New Zealand, how did the very fluid fact of New Zealand change those faiths? Generously illustrated with over 90 evocative and little-known images from church archives and personal collections.

PETER LINEHAM has for many years written and lectured extensively on the religious history of New Zealand. His recent work has focused on broader trends in contemporary religion. His most recent book is Sunday Best: How the church shaped New Zealand and New Zealand shaped the church (2017). He is currently engaged in various projects on new religious movements in New Zealand, and on Brethren, Protestant, Evangelical and Anglican history.

PUBLISHED: October 2017
ISBN: 9780994140777
Limpbound, 230 x 170mm. 464 pages. $55

Sunday Best seeks to provide a narrative of overall trends, but the shrewd reader will soon identify 'patches' in the book where unusual detail is offered on particular themes, be they coffee bars, curtseying to the bishop, soirées, Christmas, Scripture in Song or the furnishing of the parsonage. These topics could be subjects on their own, and some of them I have described in detail in other places, but the aim of the book is to set them in a cultural tradition, in a stream of development. I hope, further, that some of the other stories which I touch on will be picked up by others, who can test my arguments, and hopefully give them additional value.

The argument of this book is that understanding religious culture is highly desirable for our understanding of New Zealand society and culture as a whole. A history of the culture of New Zealand Christianity is not a history of its political significance, organisational developments, or social impact. Each of these is important, and superb recent writing has highlighted all these themes, but the lack of an understanding of the culture of New Zealand church life is evident in a number of contexts. For example, religion is regularly dismissed as of no significance because its impact was largely in the private sphere. Yet historians have repeatedly identified the importance of the private sphere. Religion sat partly in the private sphere — and indeed is a critical part of it for some people — and gaining an understanding of this ought to unlock explanations for many aspects of society and culture, including music, literacy, cultural memory, class consciousness, family formation and gender identity.
In writing a history of Massey University, I hoped to test deeply held personal assumptions about the nature of the university itself. I wanted to consider whether the university that my generation encountered in the early 1970s was but a transitory and probably imagined community built by and for the baby-boom generation. Or was my idea of a university not too distant from that of Cardinal John Henry Newman's own ideal university, one open to pluralist and tolerant enquiry among colleagues, and one still relevant today? If we do share common values with those academics and other staff who have taught and written at Massey since the 1920s, then is longevity resilience or simply habit?

Beyond these personal aspirations lies a strong belief that the university of today and the challenges it faces can only be understood in the university of the past. The values we have cherished need to be tested before they are defended in the future. A tradition of open and independent (of government, special interests or business) enquiry and debate, applied research and problem-solving supported by a strong foundation of pure, theoretical and serendipitous research has been crucial to our past and should continue to be valued in the future. The same is true of the principles of open and equal access, even if these aspirations have never been fully realised. Ironically, only through these values can Massey be fully responsive to the needs of its students and to local, national and global communities. In the disruptive challenges that face tomorrow's university, we disregard these liberal values at our peril.
The First World War is widely conceived as a pointless conflict that destroyed a generation. Petty squabbles between emperors pushed naïve young men into a nightmare of mud and blood that killed millions and left scarred and embittered survivors. However, the ongoing reinterpretation of the First World War reveals that matters were more nuanced and complex. This book, written by a range of leading New Zealand and international historians, explains how.

JOHN CRAWFORD is the New Zealand Defence Force Historian and a member of the Governance Group of the First World War Centennial History Programme.

DAVID LITTLEWOOD is a lecturer in history at Massey University’s Palmerston North campus. His research focuses on the impacts of the First World War on New Zealand and British society.

JAMES WATSON is Associate Professor in History at Massey University. His research focuses largely on the relationship between New Zealand and the UK in the twentieth century.

The First World War is often depicted as a fundamentally negative historical event. [...] Yet this popular understanding of the First World War suffers from four major problems. First, it discusses the conflict by reference to subsequent events and present-day concerns, particularly the Second World War and the geopolitical situation in the Middle East, rather than from the perspective of those who were alive at the time. Secondly, it centres on the development of ‘over-arching theories’ — ‘the lost generation’, ‘the birth of the modern’ and the ‘end of innocence’ — while omitting contradictory occurrences and neglecting specific details. Thirdly, it focuses on a narrow group of sources and the subjects they cover, meaning that trench warfare on parts of the western front often comes to represent the war as a whole. Finally, the dominant narrative implies a form of mass paralysis, where participants were powerless to avoid being caught up in a general decline from optimism to disillusionment.

Analysing the First World War via the medium of experiences allows these difficulties to be overcome. A focus on specific episodes militates against present-centredness by requiring an extensive use of primary sources. If letters, diaries, memoirs, official documents and interviews cannot entirely bridge the gap between the historian and the past, they do offer the best way to narrow it. Accessing and reproducing the words of contemporaries facilitates a much deeper understanding of how they perceived events and why they reacted to them in a particular fashion.
LITERATURE AND POETRY
So, trigger warning: this is a book of revelations. Apocalypse lives here, and it’s not going away, and these poets aren’t apologising for facing it. The same flood, storm, flame that surged through my first-ever poem is now the permanent forecast. Our days, our islands, our skins, our seas, our skies wear the stigmata of late-stage capitalism, and these poets have no interest in concealing it. They are writing — McCann again — ‘so as to not fall silent’, because they see the ruins of silence all around us, its dead institutions, its gouged earth, its bound hands, its nullifying currency, its foul oils, its crushed species.

The point where personal emergency meets collective oppression is set alight again and again in their poems — they refuse to let the hurt be siloed, classified, diagnosed, dosed, written off. They do not cower before the structures built to quietly retraumatise us. Their work ‘hits the hazard lights’ and summons all its craft to ‘hammer and wonder and cry . . . banging the tin of disappointment/and worthlessness bringing up the spectre of future/homelessness, and poverty and sickness and all that befalls’. They know the place to expose the workings of power lies deep within us, where it brands our tissue, twists our responses, sells our safety. This is the nexus that the system is so vastly invested in us not seeing, the flashpoint that poetry is so inextricably wired to force out into unforgiving radical light. ‘How would yous rate the pain?’ asks the opening piece, and the answer resounds: ‘sistine’.
Katūīvei
Contemporary Pasifika poetry from Aotearoa New Zealand

EDITED BY DAVID EGGLETON, VAUGHAN RAPATAHANA AND MERE TAITO

To write poetry in New Zealand as a Pacific migrant is an act of wayfinding, a creative process of discovery and negotiation between cultural spaces. This collection of 137 poems by 89 Aotearoa-based Pacific poets explores that navigation. This significant collection ranges from long-established voices such as Albert Wendt and Selina Tusitala Marsh and the powerful newer voices of poets such as Tusiata Avia, Courtney Sina Meredith and Karlo Mila.

DAVID EGGLETON lives in Ōtepoti Dunedin, where he is an editor, poet and writer.
VAUGHAN RAPATAHANA is widely published across several genres in both te reo Māori and English.
MERE TAITO is a poet, flash fiction writer and an interdisciplinary creative practice scholar.

The first Pasifika poet of the modern diaspora to emerge in Aotearoa New Zealand was Alistair Te Ariki Campbell, who was born in Rarotonga in 1925 and who died in Wellington in 2009. His father was a trader from Dunedin and of Scottish ancestry. His mother was from Tongareva in the northern group of the Cook Islands.

Campbell came to New Zealand at the age of eight with his siblings, after the death of both of his parents. The children grew up in an orphanage in Dunedin. Campbell began writing poetry at high school, and in 1950, after graduating from university, he became the first Polynesian poet to have a collection of his poems published in English. This book, Mine Eyes Dazzle, published by Pegasus Press, was critically acclaimed and led to Campbell being acknowledged as ‘a master of language’.

For those of the Pasifika diaspora, there is the Pacific we carry in our heads and there is a Pacific which is the site of various contestations. Campbell encountered racism in his daily life in mid-twentieth-century New Zealand, and subsequently downplayed his Polynesian identity, but his early poems are lyrical and rhythmic and animistic in a way that draws directly on his Polynesian background and intuitions. One of his best-known early poems, ‘The Return’, is full of foreboding as it speaks of ‘the surf-loud beach’, ‘mats and splintered masts’, ‘plant gods, tree gods’, and ‘fires going out on the thundering sand’.

In the Temple
CATHERINE BAGNALL AND L. JANE SAYLE

Hot on the heels of their acclaimed 2021 collaboration On We Go, artist Catherine Bagnall and poet Jane Sayle return with another collection of watercolours and poems inspired by their contemplation of nature within the context of the feminine sublime. In the Temple maintains a focus on ecological thinking, exploring intense personal connections with the natural world that take the reader into the realms of private ritual and the power and meaning of special places. In the Temple evokes a magical atmosphere, a mythological world of enchanted places with powerful and intangible connections to other living beings.

NIC LOW AND PHIL DADSON

The fifth in the groundbreaking kōrero series conceived and edited by Lloyd Jones, Little Doomsdays is another rich collaboration between an artist and a writer. This time legendary musician and painter Phil Dadson responds to a wildly innovative text that’s steeped in te ao Māori by Ngāi Tahu writer Nic Low. Together they play with the notion of ark and arc in a manner that is at once beguiling and challenging.

NIC LOW (Ngāi Tahu) is the partnerships editor at NZ Geographic magazine and the former programme director of WORD Christchurch. An author of short fiction, essays and criticism, his writing on wilderness, technology and race has been widely published and anthologised. He received the 2018 CLNZ Writers’ Award, and his story collection Arms Race was named a New Zealand Listener and Australian Book Review Book of the Year.

PHIL DADSON ONZM lectured at the Elam School of Fine Arts from 1977. In 2010 the Wellington Sculpture Trust commissioned his Akau Tangi, a wind-powered sculpture on Cobham Drive. He is a 2001 Arts Foundation Laureate, and is a recipient of a New Zealand Antarctic Artist Fellowship.

A Kind of Shelter
Whakaruru-taha
An anthology of new writing for a changed world
EDITED BY WITI IHIMAERA AND
MICHELLE ELVY

Seventy writers gather at a hui in a magnificent meeting house. In the middle is a table, the tēpu korero, from which the rangatira speak; they converse with honoured guests, and their rangatira-kōrero embody the tāhuhu, the over-arching horizontal ridge pole, of the shelter. In a series of rich conversations, those present discuss our world in the second decade of this century; they look at decolonisation, indigeneity, climate change . . . This fresh, exciting anthology features poetry, short fiction and creative non-fiction, as well as kōrero between writers. The line-up includes Alison Wong, Paula Morris, Anne Salmond, Tina Makereti, Hinemoana Baker, Erik Kennedy and Whiti Hereaka.

WITI IHIMAERA is one of Aotearoa New Zealand's best-known and most loved writers.

MICHELLE ELVY is a writer, editor and manuscript assessor.

POETRY AOTEAROA YEARBOOK 2022
TEXT EXTRACT

When the crises of our past years closed so many doors, it’s not hard to see why we reached for poetry. A poem is a space of encounter, a room of language that invites us to move our senses over its living surfaces, to brush our bodies against its echoes and pressures, visual, sculptural, sonic. A poem refuses to let us be shut down, locked out, cut off — it uses language to frame a gate to experience, calls our bodies to enter. Nothing human is off limits, no experience beyond its horizon: everything we hold is welcome in a poem’s meeting place of sound.

Its thresholds shiver with aliveness, its textures with intimacy. It’s pluralistic, participatory. A poem shares its breath, presses forward for you, forehead and fingerprints, ushers you across vast distances, to lay the weight of your living skin against its own, knowing the translated state that elicits: the miracle of transmission, connection, communion, exchange.

When you read a poem, you mingle with it — it’s a third-degree transfer, subcutaneous. To lift from Janet Frame, when you enter a poem you are re-entering the human voice, the ribs it once hollowed, the throat it drew taut, the palate it rippled, the teeth it insisted against — it asks you to use your mouth to raise the words from its chest, grant them fresh harbour in yours.

... You’ll see that we’ve re-titled this annual collection of spaces Poetry Aotearoa — a name-strengthening, a name-deepening, a fuller sounding of the same encounter; a call to the closer voicing and sharing of who, at our kaleidoscopic but tightly interwoven core, we really are.
Bordering on Miraculous

LYNLEY EDMEADES AND SASKIA LEEK

Painter Saskia Leek and poet Lynley Edmeades’ luscious collaboration, the fourth in the landmark kōrero series edited by Lloyd Jones, explores ideas of the quotidian and its everyday miracles. By working with abstraction, both painter and poet meet in a conceptual middle-ground. Leek’s high-colour palette and symbolic investigation of the domestic provide Edmeades with a starting point, to which she writes back with a chromatic and vivid pen, making use of colour and symbol in turn.

LYNLEY EDMEADES is the author of two collections of poetry, both longlisted for the Ockham New Zealand Book Awards. She has recently been appointed the editor of Landfall.

SASKIA LEEK has an MFA from Elam School of Fine Arts, University of Auckland, and has exhibited widely both nationally and internationally. She was nominated for the Walters Prize in 2010 for the exhibition Yellow is the Putty of the World.

The Lobster’s Tale

CHRIS PRICE AND BRUCE FOSTER

Exploring the lobster’s biology and its history in language, literature and gastronomy, The Lobster’s Tale navigates the perils of a life driven by overreaching ambition and the appetite for knowledge, conquest and commerce. In conversation with the text, Bruce Foster’s photographs navigate a parallel course of shadows and light, in which the extraordinary textures and colours of the natural world tell a darker story. The Lobster’s Tale is a meditation on the quest for immortality, and the unhappy consequences of the attempt to both conquer nature and create masterpieces. Meanwhile, below the waterline of text and images, a modest voice can be overheard whispering an alternative to these narratives of heroic and doomed exploration.

CHRIS PRICE’S work often hovers around the intersections between literature and science. She is the author of three poetry collections.

BRUCE FOSTER’S work meditates on the dialogue between natural and human-altered environments, and is held by major museums and art galleries throughout New Zealand.

LITERATURE AND POETRY

A poetic smorgasbord ... I’ll be carrying this book around with me for quite a while
HARRY RICKETTS, KETE BOOKS

Poetry New Zealand Yearbook 2021

It has been a locked and frozen year. Through our windows, over our screens, ran scenes of desertion and silence that were hard to recognise. Deprivation entered our homes. Doors closed on us (if we were blessed enough to have them). Some were not safe behind them (so many never were). A kind of sensory famine struck. The absence of touch cut us off from all happening. Streets emptied. Days atrophied. Certainties vanished. Loss dug trenches. We had to sit vigil in the cell of ourselves, at that still point Auden directed every poet to: some of us felt that we did touch ‘the bottom of the night’. The only line to follow was deeper in, darker down, to poetry. The page was the only safe place our breath could go.

‘Something is always born’ of visits to this place, Anaïs Nin has told us. ‘Great art was born of great terrors, great loneliness, great inhibitions, instabilities.’ Likewise, Rilke wrote that ‘all art is the result of one’s having been in danger’. A lockdown-search for lines brought me back, too, to Adam Zagajewski’s luminous mandate to ‘Try to Praise the Mutilated World,’ and Brecht’s simple four-line brutalised mantra ‘Motto’: ‘In the dark times / Will there also be singing? / Yes, there will be singing / About the dark times.’ When the doors closed on us, we knew we had to keep singing — even though some days all our songs could do was send vowel sounds into the dark.

Looking for Robin Hyde
PAULA MORRIS AND HARU SAMESHIMA

This is the second in the kōrero series edited by Lloyd Jones. Writer Paula Morris and photographer Haru Sameshima focus on the New Zealand journalist, poet, fiction writer and war correspondent Robin Hyde, exploring three locations important to her difficult life and ground-breaking work.

PAULA MORRIS, Ngāti Wai, Ngāti Manuhiri, Ngāti Whātua, is an award-winning novelist, short-story writer and essayist. A frequent book reviewer, interviewer and festival chair, she is also convenor of the Master in Creative Writing programme at the University of Auckland.

HARU SAMESHIMA completed an MFA (1995) at Elam School of Fine Arts, University of Auckland. He has exhibited and published widely in New Zealand and his images illustrate some of New Zealand’s most significant art and craft publications. He has his own publishing imprint, Rim Books, and runs his Auckland studio, Studio La Gonda, in partnership with Mark Adams.

‘Like the best picture books, it opens up vistas well beyond its relatively modest scale.’

This collaboration between Booker finalist writer Lloyd Jones and artist Euan Macleod is the first of a series of 'picture books' for grown-ups that showcase leading New Zealand writers and artists working together. This beautifully considered book richly rewards the reader and stretches the notion of what a book can do.

Lloyd Jones is one of New Zealand's most eminent writers. His bestselling novel Mister Pip won several illustrious prizes and awards including the 2007 Commonwealth Writers' Prize Best Book Award and the 2007 Montana Medal for fiction. It was also shortlisted for the 2007 Man Booker Prize.

Euan Macleod's work is represented in many private and public collections, including Te Papa, the National Gallery of Australia and the Metropolitan Museum, New York. He has won a number of major prizes including the Archibald Prize.

‘A finely crafted mystery of art, friendship and human aspiration’

Sally Blundell, Landfall
It is wonderful to be chosen by poems, and the very opposite of trying to choose poems. Choosing poems is hard work — it feels like rifling through perfectly serviceable clothes from a stockier, taller cousin. Being chosen by poems, however, is like winning a voucher from your favourite shop and being dressed by one of its very genial and talented personal assistants. The poems that choose you are must-have items.

A poem chooses you the moment it takes you by surprise. To be clear, this cannot be any old surprise. It must have the qualities of what President Oprah Winfrey calls the ‘A-ha moment’ — a sudden insight which causes the pulse to quicken and galvanic skin temperature to rise. A poem like this is no riddle; it is a messenger imparting a truth about what it is to be human in the world. In fact, it probably touches on something you have already felt or secretly known, but never quite been able to admit.

PAULA GREEN

Highly regarded poet and anthologist Paula Green’s comprehensive survey of New Zealand’s women poets, from Jessie Mackay, the first published, through to newcomers Hera Lindsay Bird and Tayi Tibble. Charmingly, Green uses the structure of a house, with different poets discussed and assessed in each of the rooms. A work of creative scholarship, it is enormously generous and makes an important contribution to New Zealand literature.

PAULA GREEN MNZM is a poet, reviewer, anthologist and children’s author. She has published eight poetry collections, including several for children. In 2017, Paula was admitted to the New Zealand Order of Merit for Services to Poetry and Literature and received a Prime Minister’s Award for Literary Achievement.

EMER LYONS, LANDFALL

For the cover of Wild Honey, Sarah Laing painted a group of women poets sharing picnic. On the front, Selina Tusitala Marsh lies daydreaming on the grass while Alison Wong talks with Ursula Bethell; Elizabeth Smither and Fleur Adcock are in conversation with Airini Beautrais; Jessie Mackay observes Blanche Baughan in company with Robin Hyde. On the back cover Tusiata Avia and Hinemoana Baker are conversing, Michele Leggott is with her guide dog. Anna Jackson is reading in a tree and Jenny Bornholdt is lost in thought. Above them a wild beehive hangs, the home of the bees that make the wild honey of the book’s title.

The notion of the hive in relation to women writing poetry resonates on many levels. The hive is a container of dark and light, and of activities that are both in view and hidden from view. The transformation of nectar to honey is akin to the transformation of words into poetry; not necessarily sweet, not at all, but fluid and fluent, and highly textured.

The hive is also a house of endeavour: bees collect, build and transform. This book is about the endeavour of New Zealand women poets over one hundred and fifty years of published poetry. Some of these women have slipped from public view, and many were not paid the honour they were due in their lifetimes. The book is neither a formal history nor a theoretical overview of New Zealand women’s poetry, but is instead a celebration and engagement with poems through my readings. In writing this book, I built a house. I moved through the rooms — collecting, building, recouping, revaluing — in order to travel through a broad range of published poetry.
Among the poets I’ve included are such well-known names as Sue Fitchett, Michele Leggott, Stephen Oliver, Bob Orr, Vaughan Rapatahana, Elizabeth Smither and Emma Neale. In her reply to my acceptance letter for the poems she’d submitted, Emma, now firmly established as the new managing editor of Landfall, explains the process of selection better than I could ever imagine doing:

...it’s finally made me realise that rejections aren’t always a comment on literary merit! And it doesn’t even mean an editor dislikes someone’s work, it just means there is chronically limited space.

Quite so. What she said. My long list for this issue was full of beautiful poems which have, one after the other, had to bite the dust for one reason or another. Never assume that your poem didn’t make it into that giant file! And don’t think that I didn’t sweat blood over those rejections, either.

Of course my subjective reactions have a great deal to do with the poems you see before you. As long as I’ve been reading her, which is almost 20 years now, I’ve been impressed and (at times) flabbergasted by the sheer virtuosic brinksmanship of Stephanie Christie’s poetry. It’s great to be able to introduce her poems to — I hope — a wider audience than they’ve so far reached in this country. Her fractured word-play — reminiscent at times of late Celan but with a pop culture edge he never achieved — can be daunting at first, but I think you’ll see after a while how relentlessly quotable she is:

I hold onto hope because I want something to do with my hands

THE WRITING LIFE TEXT EXTRACT

‘…there is an aching need for art in our country. We need an art to expose ourselves to ourselves, explain ourselves to ourselves, see ourselves in a perspective of place and time,’ wrote Bill Pearson in the landmark essay ‘Fretful Sleepers’, which was published in the literary journal Landfall in 1952. Pearson was studying at Oxford University at that time, and from that distant vantage point he reflected on the characteristics of New Zealand culture that he found stifling: the lack of intellectual discussion, the dearth of writing located centrally in New Zealand and of work conveying a rich interior life. He described the unthinking, ‘threadbare life’ of New Zealand’s citizens as ‘dumb and numb, null and dull’ and longed for talent to be realised, for emotions to be examined so there could be ‘greater depth, more joy, heavier sorrow’. New Zealand writers, Pearson argued, needed to reject the colonial influence that had smothered artistic endeavour for more than a century and find their subject matter in the people who inhabited this place. ‘It is our job to take a lead in awakening New Zealanders from their fretful sleep,’ he wrote.

In 1952 the generation of authors who are the focus of this study — Joy Cowley, Marilyn Duckworth, Tessa Duder, Chris Else, Patricia Grace, David Hill, Witi Ihimaera, Fiona Kidman, Owen Marshall, Vincent O’Sullivan, Philip Temple and Albert Wendt — were all completing their secondary educations, based on a British curriculum that advanced a Eurocentric version of history. This book follows their emergence from the cultural vacuum Pearson described through six decades of brilliant hard work to the place they enjoy now, with extensive publication histories that represent the diverse cultural richness of this place and global recognition for their contributions to literature.

Alistair Paterson has been a central figure in New Zealand poetry for many decades, as poet, editor and mentor. In late 2014, as part of a research project which involved conversations with senior poets about how creativity emerges, how it circulates, and what people do with this capacity, Professor of Creative Writing at the University of Canberra Jen Webb and Alistair met in Alistair’s Auckland home to talk about poetry and his own practice. He began by saying: ‘I don’t think of myself so much as a poet. I think of myself as still trying to become a poet — or not so much become a poet, but to write poetry. If you want to become a poet, give it up; you’ll never be any good.’

Why is it that you don’t identify yourself as a poet?
Because then you’re identifying yourself, instead of what you do or what you’re trying to do.

So the idea is, if I say ‘I’m a poet’, that freezes it?
It freezes the whole thing, because it says you’ve got somewhere, you’ve achieved something. In fact poetry is a lifelong learning process; and if you say I’m a poet, or if you say I’ve found my voice . . . Then you’re actually dead in the water. You’re finished. That’s why I don’t like to see, in some creative writing courses, the teachers talking about finding your voice. My personal view is: don’t try to find your voice, you’re wasting your time, because then it’s about you and it’s not about the verse, it’s not about the work. If you’re trying to write poetry, to create poetry, that’s an entirely different thing from finding out something about yourself. And anyway, if you’re trying to write poetry, you will discover yourself anyway. You don’t have to make an effort to do that.
I first encountered Liz Morton when she sent me some poems out of the blue. This was before I’d started to edit Poetry New Zealand, but I think she’d been advised to do so by one of my creative writing students here at Massey.

There’s always a certain trepidation in looking at other people’s poetry for the first time. What if you don’t like it? What if you can’t think of anything to say? But I did like it. Somewhat to my surprise, I found that it really spoke to me.

That must have been some time in 2013, because shortly after that, and after meeting her in person, I asked her to read at our Open Day here at the Auckland campus. She read almost as beautifully as she wrote, and it came as little surprise when she won the New Voices Emerging Poet Competition later that year.

There’s an important balance we try to uphold in Poetry New Zealand between (as we say in our blurb) ‘the work of talented newcomers and developing writers as well as that of established leaders in the field’. This has been the case since the magazine’s inception, and it’s a principle which was observed faithfully by Alistair Paterson, my predecessor as editor.

The poet I encountered in 2013 could certainly have been called a ‘talented newcomer’: her work was powerful and raw and close to the bone, but not (perhaps) as nuanced as it has now become. While I suppose one should still refer to her as a ‘developing writer’, I see the poems she’s writing now as a solid contribution to the New Zealand poetic archipelago.

I was five when the circus came to town. Right near the end of my first year of primary school. There are fragments in memory — smell of canvas and wild animals and dung, grass growing lank and pale around the metal supports of the tiered plank seating, the surrounding bush darker than ever before after we left the blare of lights behind — but the dominant image is something different, something completely unexpected. I see a mound of yellow-brown earth, heaped up by a bulldozer, upon which a clown in greasepaint and slapstick shoes climbs, there to push into the dirt the long end of a white wooden cross, and then to place before it a small bunch of garden flowers. It was the grave of Mollie the elephant and this the ceremony of her burial.

Captain Gendas delivers / the eulogy. Six o’clock on the evening of Tuesday, 17 December 1957. We were grouped outside the showground at Ohakune Junction, where the Mountain Road begins. All of the many performers and workers — about a hundred — travelling with Bullen’s Circus and, according to the Auckland Star, three times as many locals. This may be an exaggeration. Among us, I found out later, was eight-year-old Philip Clairmont, staying with his mother at Dr Shanks’ house just up the road. Merrilyn George, the local historian, still a schoolgirl, was there; and Vera Brailey, now Celeste Ventura, whose house was the last on Railway Row and whose family had given their name — Brailey’s Bush — to the beech and rimu forest growing around the nearby Mangawhero River, which can still be heard chuckling away over its stones.

Some of the stories in this book will be well known to New Zealanders; many will not. Some, I hope, will still shock and disturb you. All, I hope, will make you proud of the craft, cunning, persistence, compassion and sometimes brilliance of those journalists who unveiled them. And, of course, of the courage of those men, women and children whose stories are told here.

What exactly is investigative journalism? And how does it differ, if at all, from other types of journalism? It is sometimes argued that all journalism is investigative, in that it seeks to tell a truth. Many journalists, including some whom you will meet in these pages, believe that all journalists should investigate, in some way or another. Nevertheless, most books on investigative journalism agree that there are some things that set it apart from the journalism we see in our daily newspapers or on our favourite news sites, and watch and hear on television and radio. The great Australian journalist John Pilger, whose anthology of world investigative journalism was the inspiration for this book, suggests that good investigative journalism holds power to account, and acts as a check on power. For him, it is not just about ‘detective work’, but must also be journalism that ‘bears witness and investigates ideas’.

Journalism has also been called the ‘first draft of legislation’, because it often exposes problems so compelling that governments need to pass laws to fix them. Many of the stories in this collection did just that.

The wetlands of Aotearoa New Zealand
KAREN DENYER AND MONICA PETERS

Rich and diverse but often unloved, Aotearoa’s wetlands are the most vulnerable of our ecosystems. Only a tiny fraction of their original extent remains, and we continue to lose this vital habitat. This highly illustrated and absorbing book introduces and explores the wetlands of Aotearoa through the work and experiences of our leading researchers, and the deep cultural and spiritual significance they have for Māori.

KAREN DENYER has worked as an ecological consultant for over 20 years, much of it in wetland ecology. She has written a number of publications and has been executive officer at the National Wetlands Trust since 2008.

MONICA PETERS is co-chair of the Citizen Science Association of Aotearoa New Zealand. Her background includes hands-on conservation, research, science communication, international development and fine arts.

PHILOSOPHY
How Should We Live?
EDITED BY STEPHEN CHADWICK

Life in Aotearoa New Zealand in the early twenty-first century presents us with many controversial ethical issues: abortion, poverty, pornography, recreational drug use and social inequality. This book examines practical issues that affect people in their everyday lives and considers the ethical framework behind how we should live.

STEPHEN CHADWICK teaches philosophy in Massey University’s School of Humanities. He went on to complete an MA in social work at the University of Hull, and subsequently worked for many years with drug users, professional sex workers and people with physical disabilities. Stephen has been teaching applied ethics at Massey University since 2006. In addition, he has taught the ethics of war to officers of the New Zealand Defence Force and facilitated sessions for nurses on bereavement support.

HOW SHOULD WE LIVE? TEXT EXTRACT

All individuals face everyday ethical dilemmas, wherever they happen to live in the world, but given the particular circumstances that they find themselves in, some may seem more relevant than others. For example, the ethics of over-population might seem of little relevance to someone living in New Zealand, with a population of only 4.5 million, but of great relevance to someone living in the Philippines, a country of comparable size but with a population of over 108 million. However, in a highly interconnected world, with a global economy and with instant access to world news and social media, it is less easy to simply dismiss such issues as being irrelevant. Like never before in human history, all ethical issues are relevant to everyone.

That being said, some ethical issues are more pressing to some people than to others, and this book concentrates on dilemmas that seem particularly immediate to the lives of New Zealanders. Some of the questions raised may be relevant to individuals on a day-to-day basis, including: should I eat meat, download copyrighted music, hire a prostitute, use pornography or have an abortion?
From which detergent to buy to who we should vote for, we are constantly bombarded by reasons to believe or do something. Being able to describe, evaluate and generate reasoning and arguments effectively, appropriately and sympathetically is a key skill. This eloquent and profound book offers a handy critical-thinking toolbox for all areas of academic study, the workplace and daily life.

WILLIAM FISH is a professor in the School of Humanities at Massey. His research interests are Philosophy of Mind (Philosophy of Perception and Philosophy of Consciousness), Epistemology and Philosophy of Psychology.

Throughout your life, people will try to convince you of a mindboggling array of things, from the mundane — which brand of fabric softener to buy, what movies to see, where to go on holiday — to the critical — which school to send your kids to, which governments should be overthrown, what kinds of people should be allowed into your country.

In many of these cases, people will try to persuade you to do something or believe something by providing you with reasons to do/believe it. So should you be persuaded? Should you find the reasons they give compelling?

These are important questions, and questions that we ask ourselves — whether we realise it or not — every day of our lives. Given this, everyone can benefit from equipping themselves with a set of precision tools that can be used when called upon to evaluate reasoning. That is why we wrote this book: to give you a critical-thinking tool box that will be useful in day-to-day life, in academic study (no matter what the discipline), and in the workplace (no matter what the job).

STATE OF THREAT TEXT EXTRACT

In Aotearoa New Zealand we consider national security to be located at the intersection of domestic and international security. Since 2018, significant change has occurred in this space. Once benign, today the language around domestic and international events, trends and conflict reflects a greater sense of threat, making Aotearoa seem less secure than it was.

In stating this however, it is important to pause and think: when it comes to discussing the threats facing any country, there is always potential for the fourth estate and commentators to engage in self-interest or hyperbole. They are the first to speak whenever there is public media discussion of national security. Few experts discussing New Zealand’s national security offer evidence for their claims, however. In a post-truth world, where experts have been replaced by self-interest, spin, mis- and disinformation and fake news, what can we really know about the claims that our national security environment is becoming less secure?

National security is a constantly evolving concept, constructed and interpreted through language, policy, emotion, empirical evidence and the ‘only-sometimes-revealed’ lived reality of violence and power.
Inherent in this is the idea that the voices speaking about national security matter; in constructing the discussion, they influence and inform our emotional state and determine whether we feel secure or threatened. State of Threat: The challenges to Aotearoa New Zealand’s national security presents the editors’ view that national security is fluid, dynamic, and constructed through the discourses devoted to the security interactions occurring between New Zealand’s domestic and international environments.
The alternative to multilateralism is a world in which the big guys always win and the small guys always lose. And that would be very bad news for a small country like ours. It is in New Zealand’s interest to support good bodies of international rules and good institutions to promote them. Nowhere is this more true than in relation to the UN Security Council — the most important UN body, charged with maintaining international peace and security. And if that body was not performing to an acceptable standard, surely our goal should be to bring about some necessary improvements? We should seek to use a short two-year term on the Council to improve the manner in which it discharged its responsibilities, and to highlight the structural and cultural changes that might improve its operations for the future.

It was on this basis that I recommended to the prime minister that the government should endorse the campaign for UNSC membership and make it a foreign policy priority. It was on this basis that we campaigned to become one of two Western Europe and Others Group members of the Council for the 2015–16 term.

We sought no additional funding for our Security Council campaign — it was funded entirely from within a Ministry of Foreign Affairs and Trade (MFAT) baseline, which had already been reduced by 4 per cent in response to the global financial crisis. But we mounted an energetic campaign built around ministerial and special-envoy visits, vigorous use of our diplomatic footprint and consistent messaging. There is no substitute to calling directly on counterparts and asking for their vote. Our messages were simple. If elected we would be good listeners and fair-minded decision-makers. We would try to do what was right rather than what was popular. We would work to provide a voice at the Council for the smaller states that are so often ignored, and would take a particular interest, given our role in the Pacific, in issues affecting small island developing states (SIDS). And we would work to reform the Council and improve its culture.

— Murray McCully, former Minister of Foreign Affairs
In his discussion of the military, the famous Prussian strategist Carl von Clausewitz argued that government must know ‘the instrument it means to use’. He expected that political leaders would either have direct relevant military experience themselves, or that they would have access to military advice in deciding how this military instrument could potentially be put to use in furthering the political interests of the state. This assumption that policy-makers have access to sound military advice and that, through this advice, they know something about what militaries are and what they can do may hold true. However, outside of such privileged positions, most civilians don’t necessarily have a clear idea about exactly what contemporary militaries are and what they do. Nor do military personnel necessarily comprehend how they are perceived by those outside of the disciplined forces.

How, then, might those interested in national and international politics, military forces, or the use of military force more generally, better come to know this ‘military instrument’, especially given the purposeful separation of professional all-volunteer military forces from society in modern liberal democracies?

This book examines one such military instrument: the New Zealand Army. It aims to disseminate knowledge and ideas about military identity and military functions to help encourage informed debate about defence and security matters. It aims to help bridge the theory–practice divide in attempting to better understand, explain and critique the nature and work of militaries. This book also seeks to hold up a mirror to military personnel to help increase understanding about how the nature and work of this institution might be understood from a variety of insider and outsider perspectives.
In late May 2013 Edward J. Snowden, a citizen of the United States and, at that time, a contractor for Booz Allen Hamilton, met with three journalists at a Hong Kong hotel, where he disclosed classified material copied without authorisation from the US National Security Agency (NSA). Over the ensuing months those three journalists — Glenn Greenwald, Laura Poitras and Ewen MacAskill — researched, fact-checked and released this classified material to the readerships of the Washington Post, the Guardian, Der Spiegel and the New York Times as well as to other publications, including the New Zealand Herald. The disclosures, which reveal the invasive nature and global scope of NSA’s surveillance operations, sent a series of shockwaves that continue to reverberate throughout the world. […]

Official US reaction was swift and unequivocal. Charges of theft of government property, unauthorised communication of national defence information and wilful communication of classified communications intelligence information to an unauthorised person were brought against Snowden by the Federal Bureau of Investigation on 14 June 2013. On 23 June 2013 the director of NSA, General Keith Alexander, expressed his view that Snowden’s actions had ‘caused irreversible and significant damage to our country and to our allies’. Donald Trump went even further; he described Snowden as a traitor who deserved the most severe of punishments. Neither President Obama nor NSA Director Alexander suggested Snowden’s revelations were false, though New Zealand Prime Minister John Key proclaimed: ‘Some of the information was incorrect, some of the information was out of date, some of the assumptions made were just plain wrong’.
SOCIAL WORK
Social Work in Aotearoa New Zealand

KATHRYN HAY, MICHAEL DALE AND LAREEN COOPER

All social work students must decide where to undertake their required field placement during their study, as well as which field of practice to work in after graduation. This helpful book introduces students to five fields of practice in Aotearoa New Zealand.

DR KATHRYN HAY is a senior lecturer and Director of Field Education in the School of Social Work at Massey University. She is a registered social worker and a member of the Aotearoa New Zealand Association of Social Workers.

DR MICHAEL DALE has been a senior lecturer in the Social Work and Social Policy Programme at Massey's University's School of Social Work since 2001 and has 33 years' work experience within the social services sector.

LAREEN COOPER is a senior lecturer and Associate Head of School in the Social Work and Social Policy programme at Massey University's School of Social Work. She has an extensive background in health services management.

Social work in Aotearoa New Zealand has a dual focus:

1. To enable and empower individuals, families, groups and communities to find their own solutions to the issues and problems that beset them, and;
2. To learn from specific instances of need, to inform society at large about the injustices in its midst, and to engage in action to change the structures of society that create and perpetuate injustice.

In this text, five fields of practice in Aotearoa New Zealand have been highlighted, through the voices of the social workers as well as the authors. Drawing on the frameworks of Kamerman (2002), Nash, Munford, and Hay (2001) and Alston and McKinnon (2005), each chapter explores six aspects of the work of the social workers, including:

• their organisation
• their field of practice
• the theories and models utilised
• key issues and challenges
• bicultural considerations
• reasons for working in their organisation.
Defining Social Work in Aotearoa

MICHAEL DALE, HANNAH MOONEY AND KIERAN O’DONOGHUE

In 1976 Massey University became the first New Zealand university to offer a social work degree. This book, published in 2017, marks 40 years since that milestone. Relevant to all social workers today, its chapters highlight the political and social backdrop against which the profession has developed over the past four decades.

MICHAEL DALE has been a senior lecturer in the Social Work and Social Policy Programme at Massey’s University’s School of Social Work since 2001 and has 33 years’ work experience within the social services sector.

KIERAN O’DONOGHUE is Head of the School of Social Work at Massey University. He is a registered social worker and a member of ANZASW.

HANNAH MOONEY is a lecturer at Massey University’s School of Social Work.

‘I thoroughly recommend this well-researched, critical text’
SONYA HUNT, AOTEAROA NEW ZEALAND SOCIAL WORK

The social work profession is a bridge extended to those who are excluded, marginalised, lost and unloved within society. On a daily basis, social workers work on behalf of the public to assist individuals, groups, families, whānau and communities to change the stories and circumstances of their lives, as well as the way in which society positions them in the stories that are told about them.

Social work practice involves intervening in the social problems that impact on people’s private lives. Through the decades, social workers have undertaken this work diligently, while pressed for time and having to navigate the competing demands of clients, their agencies, resources, the law and social policy. Social workers as a group are generally unassuming, service-orientated and focused on the needs of their clients, while working for change within bureaucratic, dehumanising and rationed systems. They are engaged in social change through mediating the aspirations of human rights and social justice within civil society. Nonetheless, the realities of their work loom large, and as professionals some are often marginalised, in a similar fashion to the clients they serve.

In Aotearoa New Zealand, the social work profession has been constructed from a range of attitudes to welfare, including indigenous and Western approaches (rising from settler notions of charity delivered primarily by religious organisations). The establishment of the welfare state saw the government become the main provider of social and welfare services, through the departments of Education (Child Welfare Division), Māori Affairs (Māori Welfare Office), Health, Social Security and Justice. Up until the Department of Social Welfare Act in 1971, social workers practised under a range of titles including Child Welfare Officer, Māori Welfare Officer and Field Officer.
Old Black Cloud
A cultural history of mental depression in Aotearoa New Zealand

JACQUELINE LECKIE

Mental depression is a serious issue in contemporary New Zealand, and it has an increasingly high profile. But during our history, depression has often been hidden under a long black cloud of denial that we have not always lived up to the Kiwi ideal of being pragmatic and have not always coped.

Using historic patient records as a starting place, and informed by her own experience of depression, academic Jacqueline Leckie’s timely social history of depression in Aotearoa analyses its medical, cultural and social contexts through an historical lens.

‘Highly accessible, uniquely insightful, and an in-depth exploration of mental depression as an intrinsic part of our national fabric’

ALLAN MCEVOY, KETE BOOKS

When, in the 1990s, my family doctor put it to me that I was depressed, the biochemical model of brain chemistry was ascendant in the understanding and treatment of depression. This science emphasised an imbalance of neurotransmitters — chemical messengers — whereby depression is linked to a lack of serotonin receptors in the brain, serotonin being responsible for many key body functions, such as mood modulation, feelings of reward, sleep, digestion and healing, among many others. The implication was that my depression was due to a biochemical imbalance instead of, or perhaps in combination with, my grief over my mother’s recent death.

At times during my life I have been prescribed medications and encountered therapists who have pushed different approaches to coping with depression that seemed to relate to major loss. In 1979, after my former husband’s sudden disappearance to live with another woman, an expensive therapy session involved facing a large circle of coloured cushions that I was meant to beat or embrace. I couldn’t inflict such actions on those bits of fluff. This was a version of the Gestalt therapy that I had learned about in a first-year university psychology paper, but even so my imagination fell short. Fortunately — thanks to the excellent public health system of the time — I was treated by an empathetic psychiatrist at Auckland Hospital. We explored my family history and dynamics, my economically poor background, politics and, yes, my relationship with my mother. The sessions were structured loosely within psychoanalysis.

That psychiatrist saved my life and encouraged me to complete my PhD and pursue a career. I still recall walking along the Devonport waterfront in 1980, and seeing the sun setting, smelling the sea, hearing the waves and the seagulls and feeling the warmth of the day. For at least the previous year I had felt absolutely nothing except pain.
Otherhood
Essays on being childless, childfree and child-adjacent
EDITED BY ALIE BENGE, LIL O’BRIEN AND KATHRYN VAN BEEK

In Aotearoa the number of people who will never have children is growing — and they’re pushing back against the narrative that if they don’t, their lives will be somehow ‘less than’. Otherhood’s essays are by writers who’ve felt on the outside looking in, who’ve lived unexpected lives, and who’ve given the finger to social expectations. Some chose to be childfree, some didn’t get to choose, and some — through bereavement or blended family dynamics — ask themselves: Am I a mother or am I other?

ALIE BENGE is the essays editor for takahē magazine.
LIL O’BRIEN is an internationally award-winning copywriter (as Lil Cameron).
KATHRYN VAN BEEK was the 2023 Robert Burns Fellow at the University of Otago.

The Barrennesses group chat

With Kathryn and Lil living in Aotearoa and Alie living in London, Alie would wake up to 156 unread messages and find herself volunteered for all sorts of schemes via what we dubbed the Barrennesses group chat.
Kathryn: I am currently of the opinion that Alie should write all the essays.
Lil: I reckon. Maybe then we won’t need funding for the contributors. She can just write them for free. As different personas.
Kathryn: Love this idea.
Our professional relationship soon morphed into friendship — and a source of support.
Kathryn: Was just in a work meeting and everyone went around the table and introduced themselves by saying how many kids they have! I was so mad I couldn’t even trot out my usual ‘I have cats’ line.
Alie: Ugghhh that is the worst.
Lil: Missed opportunity to answer ‘I’m currently editing a book about the stigma faced by women without children.’
Kathryn: OK got the right response now, just 90 minutes too late: ‘I’ve got three dead babies but I did successfully change the law to have miscarriage recognised as bereavement.’
Alie: That would have been SO GOOD.

‘A vibrant antithesis to the assumption that only biological motherhood can fulfil a life and a testament to the various connections that shape our lives’
ANZ REVIEW OF BOOKS
The Crewe Murders
Inside New Zealand’s most infamous cold case
Kirsty Johnston and James Hollings

Fifty years on, the unsolved mystery of who killed Jeannette and Harvey Crewe in their farmhouse in 1970 continues to fascinate New Zealand. The subsequent trial of Arthur Allan Thomas was, for many New Zealanders, the first time they had had reason to question the fairness of our justice system. It triggered a shift in attitudes and remains one of the most controversial cases in New Zealand legal history. To date, there has never been a history of this saga that has attempted to tell all sides of the story thoroughly and without obvious bias. This book by two highly experienced journalists resets the balance and tells the story as both a sweeping drama and a nuanced social history, combining gripping narrative with detailed research.

Kirsty Johnston is an investigative journalist with an interest in inequality, gender and social justice.

James Hollings is an associate professor of journalism at Massey University in Wellington.

For all the infamy surrounding their murders on a cold winter’s night in a country farmhouse, only a handful of photos of Jeannette and Harvey Crewe remain. In these black-and-white images, we see Jeannette as a teenager, smiling in white gloves at her debutante ball; the couple on their wedding day, cheeks flushed and eyes bright; their daughter Rochelle as a toddler in overalls, her chubby hand to her mouth. And Harvey holding Rochelle, who is wearing a smock and frowning, squinting at the light.

The Crewes have now been dead longer than they were alive. They were almost certainly shot on 17 June 1970, after dinner, Harvey in his armchair by the fire while Jeannette knitted on the couch. Harvey was 28 and Jeannette was 30. An orphaned Rochelle was found five days afterwards, crying in her cot, alone. Her parents’ bodies were pulled from the Waikato River months later. Initially the public was fascinated by the young farming couple from Pukekawa and their tragic story: who were they, and who despised them enough to want them to die?

But by the end of that year, after police had arrested local farmer Arthur Thomas for their murders, the Crewes’ lives became a backdrop for a bigger drama, a fight for justice for a man many argued was wrongfully imprisoned. When that was finally won, a new battle began, this time to prove who was truly responsible. It has so far proved a futile venture.
Urgent Moments
Art and social change:
The Letting Space projects 2010–2020
EDITED BY MARK AMERY, AMBER CLAUSNER AND SOPHIE JERRAM

For over a decade, New Zealand public art mavericks Letting Space provoked contemporary artists to think radically, outside the walls of the gallery. Its projects were driven by the need to increase the public commons and comment on the amount of waste created by the current economic models, at a time when public space and public media were increasingly commodified and under surveillance. Written by both the artists themselves and leading New Zealand arts writers and thinkers, this lively book shows the vital role artists can play in creating dynamic spaces for the public to engage in difficult but necessary — and urgent — conversations.

Women and Work in Asia and the Pacific
Experiences, challenges and ways forward
EDITED BY JANE PARKER, MARIAN BAIRD, NOELLE DONNELLY AND RAE COOPER

Working women everywhere face discrimination. Inequality and lack of inclusion is reinforced through regulation, policy, behaviours and attitudes. This in-depth study examines the challenges faced by working women, their families and communities in ten countries throughout Asia and the Pacific: Aotearoa New Zealand, Australia, Japan, China, Cambodia, India, Sri Lanka, Fiji, Pakistan and the Philippines. Drawing on this wide range of qualitative and quantitative evidence, the authors set out recommendations for coordinated and context-sensitive responses specific to each country to improve the working lives of women and girls.

RAE COOPER is a professor of gender, work and employment relations at the University of Sydney Business School.

Women and girls across the globe are disadvantaged by discriminatory regulation, policy, practices, behaviours and attitudes. Although many countries have made progress in some areas for women at work and beyond, gender equality has not been achieved in any nation, with undertakings to eliminate inequalities being only partially pursued.

In 2010, the United Nations (UN) Human Rights Council established a working group on the issue of discrimination, in law and practice, against women. Renewed in 2019, this mandate was renamed as the Working Group on Discrimination Against Women and Girls (UN Office of the High Commissioner for Human Rights, 2022). That year, the Working Group consulted extensively with national experts around the world on key issues and challenges for working women and their communities. In the Asia Pacific region, the Expert Group Meeting, which was held at the University of Sydney, involved representatives from trade unions, civil society organisations, employer organisations, universities and elsewhere. I would like to thank Marian Baird, Rae Cooper and the team at the Women and Work Research Group for their collaboration in organising this Expert Group Meeting.

This book extends the Working Group’s (2020) global thematic report to the UN Human Rights Council, which focused on four themes — demography, globalisation, technological development and sustainability — with deeper analyses of working women in 10 countries in Asia Pacific, as well as a cross-country comparison. It confirms the report’s observation that working women’s challenges are substantial and require coordinated responses while nuancing our understanding of how the four thematic areas intersect with the lives of working women in different national contexts.
Sometimes you travel a long way only to discover something that was there all along in the place you left behind.

We normally think of travel as bringing new experiences, and indeed it does. I encountered many new things when I first visited China in 1997 to study Chinese at Wuhan University. If I made a list, it would include the sea-sized Yangtze, the brilliant Laotian student footballers who removed beer bottle lids with their teeth, a young man reciting a poem by heart in the twilight, and the earthy taste of lotus root.

Another thing on that list would be my first experience of being a racially marked minority. As a person of European descent, I encountered the kind of racialised othering that was in fact just as much a facet of life in New Zealand, but which, as a member of the privileged white colonial majority here, I had never experienced directly. Of course, my experience wasn’t at all equivalent to the racism experienced by Māori and others here in New Zealand. Whiteness continues to bring unfair privilege even when it is marked as other. Still, travelling to China brought home to me the racism of the place that I had left behind.

As a Māori poet, Hone Tūwhare (1922–2008) was of course all too familiar not just with the racialised othering that I experienced in China, but also with white privilege and colonisation. He writes about this in his poetic tribute to his late friend and mentor R. A. K. Mason (1905–1971) in what is also, unexpectedly, a poem about China:

Easy for you now, man. You’ve joined your literary ancestors, whilst I have problems still in finding mine, lost somewhere Victoriana-Missionary fog hiding legalized land-rape And gentlemen thugs.
HomeGround
The story of a building that changes lives
SIMON WILSON

A celebration of HomeGround, the Auckland City Mission’s unique and visionary wrap-around social services complex, which opened in early 2022 after being a dream for over 20 years. Photographed by Mark Smith and with text by both renowned writer Simon Wilson and Professor Deidre Brown and Dr Karamia Muller of the School of Architecture at the University of Auckland, it is the portrait of a remarkable building designed by leading architecture practice Stevens Lawson. This book represents an enduring record of a remarkable building built for a remarkable organisation, created through the aroha and vision of many.

The biggest challenges of the twenty-first century require global solutions. Focusing on three of the most urgent problems of our time — climate change, conflict and poverty, and inequality — Tū Rangaranga introduces the notion of global citizenship, and what it means to be an active citizen in today’s world. Part of a series of books exploring and promoting citizenship in Aotearoa and beyond, Tū Rangaranga joins Tūtira Mai (2021) and Tūrangawaewae (2022, 2017) in combining academic rigour with an examination of how to engage as an active citizen.

30 Queer Lives
Conversations with LGBTQIA+ New Zealanders

MATT MCEVOY

30 Queer Lives explores the lives, struggles and successes of LGBTQIA+ New Zealanders, from north to south and from soldiers, celebrities, lawyers, drag queens, businesspeople and Olympians to farmers and faʻafafine. From the famous — including Grant Robertson, Gareth Farr and Chlöe Swarbrick — to the less well known, these 30 stories encourage empathy and understanding, challenge stereotypes, and offer courage and hope.

MATT MCEVOY spreads his time between teaching piano, accepting the occasional local technology contract, and writing, with a particular interest in social history and the diverse stories of extraordinary people who are seldom given a voice in New Zealand culture. He is the author of The Grey Lynn Book, published in 2018.

A wonderfully encouraging book that I’m sure many of us had wished we had when we were young. The perfect gift for young allies, the recently out, family, and anyone just seeking to understand'

NEW ZEALAND LISTENER

Before I began writing this book, I thought I had some understanding of the queer people of Aotearoa, having counted myself among them for decades.

As a gay Kiwi kid growing up through Auckland Catholic schools, books about All Blacks, Sir Edmund Hillary or wealthy businessmen were ubiquitous in the school library or bookshops, while stories about other New Zealanders were rarely, if ever, seen. My motley crew of friends and I wanted to read about New Zealanders we could relate to, but the singular elevation of the sports hero genre led to a sense of isolation, making us feel that perhaps we weren’t ‘real New Zealanders’.

The people you’ll meet inside this book hail from a wide range of backgrounds of sexuality, gender, ethnicity and privilege, and they stretch the length of the country, from Panguru to Invercargill. Travelling across Aotearoa to bring their 30 stories together, meeting them and listening carefully to their life stories cut through landscapes of hardship and tragedy, love and triumph. As they opened a window to their interior worlds, each person I met expanded my own horizons and my understanding of the diversity of human experience.

Most of these people don’t see themselves as role models, but to me they certainly are. The stories of what drives them to forge ahead in the face of numerous obstacles are told with honesty and generosity. They show us how to live with integrity, optimism, hope, determination and compassion. They refuse to fade into the background, or to maintain a self-defeating façade. Instead, they channel their energies into creating lives of meaning, creativity and authenticity.
It Takes a Village
A guide to Matakana and its surrounding districts
LAURAIN JACOBS

Matakana village lies at the heart of one of New Zealand’s loveliest regions, where rolling hills and small valleys are fringed by glorious beaches and gentle estuaries. Perhaps best known these days for the Saturday morning farmers’ market and stunning beaches like Tāwharanui, in the past decades it’s become home to an increasing number of artisanal food businesses, wineries, restaurants, cafés and accommodation providers. It Takes a Village lets readers in on the secrets only locals know and is an expert companion to all the area has to offer, written by one of New Zealand’s best-known food writers.

LAURAIN JACOBS is one of New Zealand’s best-known food writers, with a magazine career stretching back to Cuisine magazine and the New Zealand Listener and including writing or editing twelve books.

A Queer Existence
The lives of young gay men in Aotearoa New Zealand
MARK BEEHRE

A Queer Existence is a major documentary project that uses photographic portraiture and oral history to record the life experiences of a group of 27 gay men born since the passing of the Homosexual Law Reform Act in 1986, whose life experiences have been very different to earlier generations of gay New Zealand men. Candid, powerful and affecting, the first-person narratives of A Queer Existence form a valuable and unique insight into how gay men continue to have to step out of the main stream and face their own challenges as they forge their queer identities.

MARK BEEHRE trained as a specialist physician (MB, ChB, FRACP), and has continued to work part-time in medicine while studying and practising photography.

A valuable record of a moment in time . . . it will provide a resource for young men seeking experiences of comparison but it is also a fine historical record of the individual and social attitudes in the early 21st century

DAVID HERKT, KETE BOOKS

For me, the strangest thing about the whole Homosexual Law Reform campaign is that, at a personal level, I remember nothing at all about it. In 1985 I was in my third year of university, struggling to preserve a Christian faith that in years past had been a vital and life-changing part of my life, and profoundly closeted. I have clear recollections of the Springbok Tour, David Lange’s nuclear-free policy, and the Rainbow Warrior affair, and yet those 16 months of demonstrations, debate and intensive media coverage have left no impact at all on my memory. I had been aware of my attraction to men since the start of high school, but never spoke of that to anyone. During the summer of 1985/1986 I fell deeply in love with a man I knew from church, and the realisation of what was happening precipitated a crisis that took me to the verge of suicide. ‘I’m a Christian, and I’m in love with a man,’ I said to myself one night in my bedroom, ‘and these two things are irreconcilable.’ The months that followed were some of the worst of my life, and it was to be another 10 years before I had moved forward in my theology, and my sense of self, to the point that I was able to come out.

Doing the research for this essay has been like reading about events in a far-away country or a remote period of history. I discovered that, on 14 August 1986, lesbian and gay activists infiltrated and disrupted a meeting held by the anti-gay American Lou Sheldon at the North Shore Faith Centre in Auckland. My parents, with whom I was living, attended that church every Sunday, as did I occasionally. I have no recollection of that at all. Just two vignettes from the whole campaign have lodged in my mind. The first is of the noticeboard outside our downstairs lecture theatre on the medical school campus in Grafton, where the students’ Christian Fellowship to which I belonged had pinned up that infamous petition. I signed it. Aware as I was of my desires, I sincerely believed that to act on them would have been wrong. The second is of walking down Wellesley Street with a classmate on the way to the bus. It must have been the day after the final vote. ‘Well, we’re legal now,’ he said. He wasn’t a close friend. I didn’t know how to reply.
Invisible
New Zealand’s history of excluding Kiwi-Indians

JACQUELINE LECKIE

Despite our mythology of benign race relations, Aotearoa New Zealand has a long history of underlying prejudice and racism. The experiences of Indian migrants and their descendants, either historically or today, are still poorly documented and most writing has focused on celebration and integration. Invisible speaks of survival and the real impacts racism has on the lives of Indian New Zealanders. It uncovers a story of exclusion that has rendered Kiwi-Indians invisible in the historical narratives of the nation.

JACQUELINE LECKIE is a researcher and writer based in Ōtepoti Dunedin. She is a former adjunct research fellow with the Stout Centre for New Zealand Studies at Victoria University of Wellington. Her research is concerned with the Indian diaspora, development, gender, ethnicity, mental health and work within the Asia Pacific.

Employment has been one of the main areas where Kiwi-Indians have faced discrimination: in obtaining work, promotions and appointments, and in purchasing land and businesses. White race organisations argued that competition from Asians in employment and business was a reason to restrict immigration.

Indian politician Srinivasa Sastri confirmed that Indians suffered racial prejudice in employment when he toured New Zealand as part of a mission to investigate the conditions of Indians in the white Dominions in 1922. Discrimination, in both formal and covert forms, affected those in self-employment and in waged work. Calls to exclude Indians from the workplace were tied to immigration exclusion. Discrimination at work could be all-pervasive, affecting residence and accommodation. Although exclusionary demands to introduce legislation to restrict or exclude Indians from employment or property ownership surfaced, formal enactment of this agitation was rare, given that it would have been at odds with New Zealand’s egalitarian ethos.
‘What can we do?’ is a common response when we are faced with social, political or environmental issues. At this critical time, the ability to actively engage with problems that are important to our communities is a vital skill. Tūtira Mai helps readers to generate realistic and effective ways to make change, with first-hand accounts of success and failure through real-world case studies. Topics include justice reform, gender in the classroom, environmental care and management, sport and positive social change, taking action on mental health, digital democracy, social entrepreneurship and direct action.

At a moment when the planet is so clearly in peril, the trees stand as both guardians and messengers. They have words for us — if only we would listen. We need to build a robust ‘tree sense’. This collection of essays, art and poetry by artists, activists, ecologists and advocates — including Philip Simpson, Anne Noble, Elizabeth Smither, Kennedy Warne and Glyn Church — discusses the many ways in which humans need trees, and how our future is laced into their roots and branches.

Although only one tree may be visible in the ground, there may be many invisible trees at work within its drip line, all of which are constructed in the minds of observers according to the meanings and values they hold, and consequently impose, upon the blameless tree. We see trees differently. Some of us affectionately consider them to be sentient beings, while others prioritise their practical attributes of shade and shelter, carbon sequestration, timber production, botanical collection and food. Where some people stand back in awe of the beauty of their autumnal colour changes, others grumble at their leaf-fall. While some champion our indigenous trees, others find superior beauty in exotics, and while some work to protect trees, others labour to fell them.

We may regard trees through any one or any combination of these various lenses, and if this book has a predominant purpose it is to demonstrate to you, the reader, that there are other ways of thinking about trees. Of course, the other way recommended by each of this book’s contributors is the manner in which they individually appraise trees. And although we may come from a variety of disciplines and experiences, collectively we are biased; each of us has a deep respect for trees.

Probably, you feel the same way. If you were not interested in the environment and its trees, why else would you select this volume from the bookshop table, library shelf or a friend’s desk? To a certain extent this book will preach to the converted. But that’s all right, because your thoughts, your opinions and your ways of thinking about trees are valuable. And as we all face up to climate change and the ongoing, alarming challenges to our natural world, we need to stick together, draw strength from one another and preach to the unconverted as well.
This book is essential reading for first-year tertiary students in social policy and related subjects, as well as the wider policy-making community. The huge breadth of coverage includes policy design and implementation, big data, social investment, taxation and social policy, and policy monitoring and evaluation. Chapters on the key policy domains of health, education, housing, poverty, justice, families and children, gender, among others, are described, along with appraisals of the policy impacts of alternating approaches to government through the first two decades of the twenty-first century.

The New New Zealand

PAUL SPOONLEY

This major new book by Distinguished Professor Paul Spoonley looks at our rapidly growing population and the dramatically changing demographics within it. To his mind, we are not taking enough notice and we urgently need a population policy. With chapters including ‘Why would anyone want to live in Auckland?’, this book will fuel many a dinner party and policy-making conversation.

PAUL SPOONLEY is one of New Zealand’s leading academics and a Fellow of the Royal Society Te Apārangi. He has led numerous externally funded research programmes, has written or edited 25 books and is a regular commentator in the news media.

In 2030 there may be six million of us. One and a half million of us will live overseas. We will be clustered in Auckland, dependent on migration, and worried about a shortage of workers. We haven’t planned for this. We need to.

The New New Zealand.
Facing demographic disruption.
Paul Spoonley.

A very different Aotearoa New Zealand is emerging. Much of the demographic change is unprecedented in this young country, and in human history in general. On the one hand is the very large size of the cohort of those reaching age 65 and living longer. On the other is a fertility implosion, as family formation changes and births decline. The demographic structure is changing to such a degree that much of what we have put in place by way of policy or the provision of amenities and services is simply no longer appropriate or adequate.

If we do not engage with the implications of our current and future demography, using new (and often radically different) thinking, we gift future generations of New Zealanders a number of problems. We do them a major disservice.

After all, we have got to five million people far more quickly than anyone had predicted, at a rate the public was probably largely oblivious to. If those growth trends continue, how long until we are at six million? Is there a willingness to understand the evidence and to be open to what demographers are pointing out? And how proactive and forward-looking are our leaders likely to be? The new New Zealand is here, and we need to talk about it.

Sleeping Better in Pregnancy

CLARE LADYMAN WITH LEIGH SIGNAL

Featuring the latest research from New Zealand’s internationally renowned Sleep/Wake Research Centre, this beautiful book has trusted and authoritative information for New Zealand mothers-to-be. It helps pregnant women make the most of sleep opportunities during a time when a good night’s sleep is crucial for their health and the health of their babies.

CLARE LADYMAN’s PhD looked at how sleep and mental health are related throughout pregnancy and postnatal periods, and how providing information on sleep can help reduce the likelihood of mothers experiencing depression. She completed her research studies at the Sleep/Wake Research Centre and Massey University.

One of the biggest challenges for me as a coach was after the World Championships win in 1987. I had a great team that was really united. They were amazing because they knew what they wanted, and several of them had been at the 1983 World Championships when we didn’t handle the final very well. When I sat on the sideline of that tournament in 1987, I’d been coaching the New Zealand team since 1974, and for the first time I almost saw the work ahead to develop a new team, as three or four of them were going to retire. So when I came back to New Zealand there was a new group of players going to come into the national team.

It was going to be very difficult for the next coach because Trinidad and Tobago, who came second [at the World Championships], were the team that was going to tour New Zealand the next year. I thought if the new coach got out there and Trinidad beat New Zealand — which they’d never done — the public would never forgive her. She’d have the critics on her shoelaces. So I thought I would stay on for that year, as I could afford to lose.

However, I had to grow some players quickly and I was mean to those players; I really gave them a hard time, there’s no doubt about it. I nearly killed them. We won the first game, but lost the second, in Palmerston North; and then in Christchurch Sandy Edge ruptured her Achilles, although we went on to win that game, and the series. After we lost in Palmerston North reporters approached with a mic and mentioned it being ‘the first time you’ve ever lost to Trinidad and Tobago’. I replied, ‘Well, that’s one record we don’t have to worry about any more, isn’t it?’ — Dame Lois Muir
Registered clinical psychologist Robyn Salisbury seeks the wisdom of those who have devoted their lives to working in the area of child sexual abuse. Driven by Salisbury’s wish to challenge abused children’s invisibility and abusive adolescent’s and adult’s power, this book makes a major and unique contribution to understanding how we can best tackle child sexual abuse as a nation, and how urgent it is that we do.

ROBYN SALISBURY is a registered clinical psychologist and sex therapist with many years’ experience in private practice. Her particular interests are in-depth individual psychotherapy and dealing with issues of sexuality and intimacy with individuals and couples. For many years, as ‘Mrs Salisbury’, she has written a weekly magazine column that focuses on relationship and sexuality. Her practice is based in Palmerston North.

We New Zealanders are a compassionate and generous people. We want nothing but the best for our young people. Our vision for childhood is one where its taonga — our children — are nourished and nurtured, and where they thrive. But child abuse, and in particular child sexual abuse, casts a sharp shadow across this vision. Increasingly we are aware of the power of this shadow and the price it demands from too many of our children. That cost is physical, emotional, psychological, indeed spiritual. It can leave children diminished and broken. The tragic fact is that New Zealand has had, and continues to have, a major problem with child sexual abuse. It is a crisis. No instance of abuse of a child is acceptable, but the rate of child sexual abuse in this country is profoundly concerning. […]

Free to Be Children makes an excellent and contemporary contribution to the discussion of child sexual abuse. It will provoke thought on this crisis. It will broaden readers’ understanding of the key issues at play. It will contribute to a better response and encourage a more professional and effective practice across all disciplines. It should be required reading for anyone working in the field, and it will richly repay careful reading.

Heartland Strong

Edited by Margaret Brown, Bill Kaye-Blake and Penny Payne

The decline of our small towns and loss of population is a long-running concern in provincial New Zealand. In this breakthrough book, a range of experts look at how rural communities can build resilience and strengthen their economic and social fabric. With useful case studies and proven policy suggestions.

The future of New Zealand’s rural communities is unclear. Empty shops, depopulation and lack of jobs are all offered as signs that many towns are dying. However, the strength of social ties and development of digital technologies, the innovations in rural entrepreneurship and the functioning informal economy suggest that some rural communities are in good health.

As researchers, we wanted to know what people in these towns thought about their own resilience, so we went and asked them. In 2016 we held a series of workshops in several small North Island towns and asked residents how their communities were doing. To some extent, what they said wasn’t surprising. They pointed to businesses and government offices that had closed, to environmental issues that needed addressing, to schools and clubs that didn’t have enough members, and to difficulties accessing services such as healthcare, post offices and banks.

At the same time, they talked about what they did have. They had good schools with excellent staff. They had natural resources such as rivers, lakes and bush for locals and tourists to use. They spoke of strong Māori culture with proud whakapapa and diverse iwi. Most of all, they talked about living in places where they knew people on the street and could stop for a natter and a cuppa. They identified strong rural communities and a sense of belonging.
Conversations About Indigenous Rights
Edited by Selwyn Katene and Rawiri Taonui

Marking the 10th anniversary of the UN Declaration on the Rights of Indigenous Peoples, this collection of essays, featuring Selwyn Katene, Pita Sharples, Naida Glavish, Moana Jackson and Rawiri Taonui, advances a framework for future action.

Selwyn Katene, Ngāti Toa, Ngā Ruahine, Ngāti Tama and Ngāti Tuwharetoa, was Professor of Māori and Indigenous Leadership and Director of the Global Centre of Indigenous Leadership at Massey University. He has been a senior manager at the Mental Health Commission, Ministry of Health and Public Health Commission.

‘This collection provides hope in the form of a new generation seeking to unlock the potential of the Declaration’

Linda Te Aho, Journal of New Zealand Studies

This book presents perspectives by writers from Aotearoa New Zealand and the international community reflecting on the tenth anniversary of the United Nations General Assembly’s adoption of the United Nations Declaration on the Rights of Indigenous Peoples. […]

Starting a decade ago, the focus of the Declaration is now on strengthening Indigenous community participation and advocacy. People are becoming more aware, motivated, passionate and committed to fully implement the Declaration. Indigenous peoples are change agents. The Declaration has now passed to a new generation of well-qualified, high-calibre and visionary younger leaders to make the Declaration more relevant and impactful. It is the authors’ hope that the ideas and experiences they share in Conversations About Indigenous Rights will contribute to that voyage.
Imagine if our cultural and institutional rituals and behaviours were Māori. Think, for example, about all those election debates. Instead of partisan and predictable performances, naff attempts by politicians to personalise themselves with references to ‘hard-working Kiwis’ or that summer they spent mucking in with the common folk at the meat works, imagine if we’d had a Māori framework. What if Bill English and Andrew Little had been required to recite their pepeha (ancestry) and then have a significant waiata they’d selected to perform. What if they’d had to bring a rōpu (group) willing to tautoko (support) them and sing it with them. In te ao Māori the art of formal speech-making, whaikōrero, is elevated. A great speaker has an appreciation of history, wit and metaphor. Māori oratory is closer to poetry in some settings and our speakers are performers. They can use the stage — whether it is the paepae, the community hall or parliament — to great effect, with dramatic pauses, jokes and impassioned exhortations littered throughout.

Wouldn’t you rather have watched that?

Why stop there? Think about the economy, immigration, housing, the environment and aged care through the lens of a Māori New Zealand — these are all issues that could benefit if the paradigm were tikanga Māori.

— Emma Espiner, ‘We’re All Māori Now’
Leading UK economist Guy Standing has referred to the precariat as a class-in-the-making. This important book moves beyond the world of labour to identify and illustrate other forms of precarity in New Zealand, including the lack of opportunities for cultural expression and the struggle to be safe.

SHILOH GROOT, Ngati Pikiao, Ngati Uenukukopako, is a lecturer in Social Psychology at the University of Auckland. She is the co-chair of the tangata whenua caucus for the New Zealand Coalition to End Homelessness.

CLIFFORD VAN OMMEN is a senior lecturer at the Centre for Psychology at Massey University. He has published in the area of critical neuroscience, body studies and the history of psychology.

BRIDGETTE MASTERS-AWATERE, Te Karawa, Tūwharetoa ki Kawerau, Ngai te Rangi, is a lecturer at the University of Waikato, where she is also a principal investigator for the Māori and Psychology Research Unit (MPRU).

This collection of essays represents a unique dialogue between and among academics, emerging researchers and advocates. It is an attempt to distil into an approachable narrative the accumulated decades of expertise represented by the authors, typically disseminated through empirical and conceptual research that can yield technical books, reports and numerous peer-reviewed journal articles (some of which have been cited here). Drawing on their different vantage points to inform their analyses, the authors share their respective experiences of researching, teaching, advocating and/or working with precariat individuals and groups. Each of the contributors does this with the aim of developing a more nuanced understanding of the precariat in Aotearoa New Zealand and providing pathways forward.

In this book, we turn our attention to this emerging class, the precariat, not to further vilify them, but rather to place their lived experience in plain sight. It is time all New Zealanders understood the reality of what many of our own citizens endure in the struggle to make ends meet and live dignified lives.
The Treaty on the Ground

EDITED BY RACHAEL BELL, MARGARET KAWHARU, MICHAEL BELGRAVE, KERRY TAYLOR AND PETER MEIHANA

It's over 175 years since the signing of the Treaty of Waitangi. At times they've been years of conflict and bitterness, but there have also been remarkable gains and positive changes that have made New Zealand a distinct nation. This timely book brings together key thinkers on Treaty issues who take a well-informed look back and also give a considered view of the road that lies ahead.

‘The more we talk about, think about and learn about the treaty the better, even when — or especially when — we disagree about what it is or should be’
PAUL LITTLE, NORTH & SOUTH

To really see the Treaty on the ground is going to require Pākehā to step up and shrug off the invisibility cloak of white privilege. April Bennett, one of the speakers in the Treaty on the Ground conference held at Auckland Museum in July 2015, was asked a question about the role of Pākehā in all this. Her answer? ‘Kia kaha, e hoa mā. Go forth and gather together the resources that already exist, the people who are already committed, and start having a Pākehā conversation.’ As I was told once, around the dinner table, the biggest problem facing Māori is Pākehā. So what are you going to do about that? Learning more about Pākehā responses to te Tiriti, and understanding that not only is there already Pākehā Treaty practice but there needs to be more of it, seem like good places to start.
— Damian Skinner, ‘Kia Kaha E Hoa Mā: The Treaty in the Pākehā Everyday’

Modern debates on citizenship — the roles, values and identities that citizens are to play, hold or perform — are often old debates recast. Taking a historical and comparative approach to the subject illuminates issues that have commonly been key to defining the citizen’s relationship with the state. This book places these issues within their historical contexts to highlight the need to see them as part of broader social processes and problems. For instance, ‘citizenship’ has never quite been the all-inclusive category that the name seems to imply; defining the values and identities of citizens in the present, as it has in the past, may well be implicated in processes of power that include some and exclude others.

This book also shows, however, that the differences between past and present are just as significant as the similarities, and that these too are informative: sensitivity to the past’s otherness, to citizenship in other societies, develops awareness of the contingency of modern debates on present and changing contexts. ‘Critical’ citizens, who engage actively with contemporary issues, will also need to engage with the past: understanding their sense of place in society, being able to question present norms, values and identities, demands a critical perspective on the histories of their own political communities and those of others.

What am I looking for, here on the far side of 50? What is it that gnaws at me? Regret? The emptying hourglass? The lost chances? The squandered possibilities?

I host talk radio sometimes, and I share my melancholy about this. Melancholy? Or self-pity? The callers are very kind. Mostly their advice is to relish the time remaining, forget what’s gone. They say ‘every day above ground is a good one’ and ‘seize the day’ and other clichés but they also talk about the reward of doing things for others, for the sports group, for the school, for refugees new to the country — taking yourself out of the frame, replacing it with something more important.

There is plenty to be doing. We have contaminated rivers, we have children living in poverty, we have families who are victims of economic ‘rationalism’. This is a time of abundance, and yet we could scarcely be worse at sharing it about. We have people living in damp, mouldy flats. Their pay is too little, their rent is far too much. Fear, greed, and blind disregard for the consequences of borrowing billions, and pretending our houses were worth two and three times as much as they really are, have landed us in a hopeless mess.

Regrets? We should have a few. We would have a superannuation fund as mighty as Singapore’s if Prime Minister Muldoon hadn’t killed it dead. Billions of investment dollars that never were. We’re hardly smarter today. We have a super fund, 10 years old this year, grown to 29 billion from a standing start, but not enough to impress the Minister of Finance. But for the 12 billion in contributions he has withheld, it could have been worth 48 billion today. Lucky, farsighted, capable Singapore. Housing costs there are within everyone’s reach. There, the state owns land. There, the state builds accommodation on a grand scale. Staggering to think we once did the same then lost the plot.

— David Slack, ‘Look Through Any Window’
New Zealand, like nations throughout the world, faces a period of significant change and uncertainty. These changes pose challenges for communities across the country. How we manage these challenges and the decisions we make today will have a direct bearing on our quality of life in years to come.

Changes to our climate, environment, demography and the nature of work will alter the ways we live considerably. Whether it’s coping with increased urbanisation and what that means for both cities and regions, responding to climate change, or caring for our environment, big challenges lie ahead.

How these changes affect regional New Zealand will have a huge impact on the whole country. The theme of this book strikes a chord with the local government sector in New Zealand, where considerable work is under way to identify the major shifts and begin conversations with communities about how to build resilience and ensure everyone has the opportunity to prosper.
VETERINARY SCIENCE AND AGRICULTURE
Livestock Production in New Zealand
Revised edition
EDITED BY NATALIA MARTÍN AND NICHOLAS SNEDDON

The updated edition of this comprehensive book is an indispensable guide to the management of dairy cattle, beef cattle, sheep, deer, goats, pigs, poultry, horses and farm dogs in New Zealand. Written mainly by experts from Massey University’s Institute of Veterinary, Animal and Biomedical Sciences, it’s of value and interest to everyone from students to farmers, right across New Zealand’s agribusiness sector. Whether you rather dairy cattle, beef cattle, sheep, deer, goats, pigs, horses, farm dogs or poultry, advice that reflects farming practice in New Zealand is indispensable. This book, written by experts from Massey University and Lincoln University, is of value and interest to everyone.

The world needs nutrition-driven agriculture that operates within planetary boundaries, but a recent OECD report on New Zealand’s environmental performance showed how our agricultural sector’s continual push at those boundaries poses grave risks. Meantime, a range of health indices show that how and what we eat makes many of us ill. Plus, valuable revenue and jobs are lost because we don’t champion the great food we do produce.

There is no free lunch — no matter what food is grown and how it is processed and transported to the consumer, there is an impact on the planet. This impact creates consequences for individuals, societies and communities, and although this is not a difficult idea to grasp, it is harder to quantify the scale of the impact. It is harder still to decide what to do about it and how to make the best choices as individuals, within communities and for a country. But it is one which we all have a responsibility to grapple with to the best of our ability, for the sake of our grandchildren and those who follow them.

What can be done? In this volume you will find no shortage of ideas and no lack of intelligent commentary from passionate people who have given their energy to finding solutions to the problems that affect us all.
The New Zealand Land & Food Annual 2016

EDITED BY CLAIRE MASSEY

When agriculture catches a cold, the entire economy sneezes. That’s where The New Zealand Land & Food Annual comes in. It features cutting-edge, provocative and expert views on the broad agrifood and agribusiness sector. It aims to serve the national interest, inform debate, and to be of value to experts, policy makers and the general public.

PROFESSOR CLAIRE MASSEY is Massey University’s Director of Agrifood, and in this capacity leads the university’s agrifood strategy and provides a focus for the activities that occur across the university’s academic units and service lines. Professor Massey heads Te Puna Whakatipu, which leads and supports university-level projects in agriculture and food.

In this volume, the first in an intended annual publication, you will find chapters that pose questions and encourage debate. Some have been written by researchers and relate closely to long-running research programmes; others are based on an industry perspective and a personal viewpoint of the way forward for New Zealand. Farmers, bankers, scientists, economists, manufacturers and exporters are all represented here. They address the subtitle Why waste a good crisis? in some way, asking: Can we use the current situation facing the dairy industry to stimulate action across New Zealand that will shift the nation’s earnings while maintaining our standard of living? In some areas the way forward will appear clear, but in others there are debates about the best options. In some areas the question is one of timing. While there is an increasingly strong call to limit the way in which stock effluent flows into waterways, for example, the science is still developing. At present we can simply limit this impact, not remove it completely.
